Mr. BURGESS. The gentleman admits under our oath of office we are held bound in conscience to the Constitution, regardless of what the Supreme Court has said it means. The gentleman has conceded that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this question. He did not seem to catch the pertinency of the question put by the gentleman from Kentucky a few moments ago. You would vote—I know you would, and I need not ask the question—for a bill to compel national banks to pay interest upon their deposits?

Mr. BURGESS. I surely would.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You would do that notwithstanding the fact, from your standpoint of what you believe about the Constitution, that the whole national banking system is founded on an unconstitutional act of Congress taxing out of existence State bank issues. Now, is not that true?

Mr. BURGESS. No; I do not agree to the whole proposition as the gentleman puts it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do you not agree the whole national banking system could exist for a moment except by virtue of that act?

Mr. BURGESS. That is likely true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then this whole system is based upon that. Then I say, are not the two cases analogous? When you are voting to diminish a burden, making less onerous burdens under a system in your opinion unconstitutional, assuredly the gentleman must recognize that when we sat down here, for example, and voted for the Wilson bill as it left this House that we were not able to get every particle of protection out of the Wilson bill.

Mr. BURGESS. There is no question of that sort now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think there is, from my standpoint, and for this reason, and I have pretty good Democratic authority for it, that any tariff levied for any other purpose than for revenue is unconstitutional. I think the gentleman agrees with me. Of course if it is levied for a revenue and incidentally protects that is another thing that is incidental. But the gentleman agrees with me that a schedule levied for protection, to hot-house an industry, from the standpoint which he and I occupy, and which by the way very few people else do occupy——

Mr. BURGESS. I think that is true. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). Is unconstitutional, because even Democrats in these days palter with the immorality and unconstitutionality of the tariff system. Then, whenever we vote for a bill which contains upon it any schedule that was protective in its character, then, though it was a reduction from the schedule still more highly protected the gentleman would say that we violate the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. BURGESS. No; I would not say that, because the question the gentleman suggests can only be solved in the conscience of the legislator himself. But that is not the case; it is not the question here. It is not a question of cutting down the abuses of the constitutional tariff system here, but it is a question of whether any tariff at all can be constitutionally levied between the United States and the Philippines.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. BURGESS. Now, wait a minute. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] interrupt, and they ask a lot of other questions, but this is the question, namely, Can any rate of tariff be constitutionally levied between this country and the Philippines? I think not, and therefore I will vote against any rate of tariff.

Now, the gentleman, if by his reasoning or otherwise can satisfy his mind, and the gentleman from Kentucky can satisfy his mind, by saying that I will vote against grand larceny and vote for petty larceny, and let it go at that, let us consider the incident closed, and let me go on with my speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman let me ask him one more question?

Mr. BURGESS. I think I have been mighty nice to the gentleman. He has taken up most of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman has also tried to be nice to you. If he desires to go ahead, however, I shall not ask him the question.

Mr. BURGESS. Go ahead and ask your question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will take the gentleman's standpoint now. He regards the present tariff between us and the Philippines as unconstitutional. The Supreme Court says it is not, and I take my law from the Supreme Court. But suppose I agree with the gentleman for the sake of argument. Suppose I say this is an unconstitutional burden upon consumers in both countries, then does the gentleman mean to tell me that he can not see the difference between bringing into existence that unconstitutional burden, and when opportunity presents itself, rendering it less burdensome by reducing it?

Mr. BURGESS. I confess I do not. I confess that I face the same proposition when I vote for any rate of tariff. I do not care whether it reduces or whether it increases—that is immaterial. I am voting for it, and I can not get away from it. I go on record by saying that I voted for a tariff at such a rate between the Philippines and this country when I believe that under the Constitution I ought not vote for any tariff.

Now, let that go. Will the Clerk please read the resolution?

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 44) requesting the President to consider the expediency of effecting a treaty with European powers providing for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands and to protect an independent government there when established.

Resolved, etc., That it is the purpose of the United States to cease exercising sovereignty over the Philippine Islands as soon as may be with justice to them, and honor to the United States, and that it is the preference of the United States to accomplish this purpose by establishing an independent government in said islands; that in pursuance of such purpose and preference the President is respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Italy, Spain, and Japan with a view of effecting a joint treaty with such governments, by which it shall be provided that an independent government in the Philippine Islands, when established by the United States, shall be recognized and preserved; that pending the establishment of such independent Philippine Government the Philippine Islands shall be neutral territory; that such Philippine Government, when established, shall agree that it will maintain equality of trade relations toward all the signatory powers, and that in the event of war between any of the nations of the earth it shall be neutral; that such concessions as may be made the United States in the establishment of such independent government shall be recognized by all the signatory powers.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I shall claim the indulgence of the House while I attempt to discuss what I conceive to be an American plan, nonpartisan, to which any man of any view in politics may subscribe, and solve once and for all the most difficult problem which now confronts the American people. I have been thinking for more than three years, with whatever ability I possess, more about this question than all other questions combined. I have recognized the difficulty in the settlement of the question growing out of the political aspect which it immediately assumed when it came into being, and it is my earnest desire in what I shall say in reference to it to-day to utter no partisan expression, no partisan criticism, but to discuss this matter as an American citizen, freeborn and expected to exercise the right of such, and as such I desire to appeal to every Member on this floor, regardless of what party commission he may hold here, to consider earnestly and seriously this matter.

I introduced at the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress a House resolution almost identical with the one which has just been read. Subsequent reflection convinced me that the resolution ought to be joint, and I introduced it on the day shown by the resolution. I have been happy to find since that I have much support, regardless of party, of the resolution which I have presented. I notice that on the 4th day of January this year the distinguished and very able gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], who sits on the other side of the House, introduced a resolution in part like mine, and which has been referred to the same committee. I wish to say briefly of that in passing, that as far as it goes I am in hearty accord with the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts. But I think it does not go far enough; that it is not clear enough; that it does not protect the particular interests, and does not give proper direction to negotiations, if we direct they shall be undertaken.

Now, I want briefly to discuss the reasons why I think this resolution ought to be adopted. In addition to all that I have said about the difficulties that confront us in every character of Philippine legislation—and I am frank to say that was the main purpose I had in view in what I have to say with reference to these matters—I do not attach very much importance one way or the other to the Philippine bill except as being a striking instance that we can not legislate intelligently at all with respect to those islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, first I wish to discuss the reasons why the first sentence of this resolution ought to be adopted regardless of whether the rest is, or whether, if it should be, the treaty proposed under it could be negotiated. The first sentence reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., That it is the purpose of the United States to cease exercising sovereignty over the Philippine Islands as soon as may be with justice to them and honor to the United States, and that it is the preference of the United States to accomplish this purpose by establishing an independent government in said islands.

The adoption of that resolution involves the discharge of a plain duty inherent and exclusive in Congress. If you have read much of the political history of our country you will agree with me when I say that almost from the beginning, due perhaps to a spirit of hero worship that a few men like George Washington were big enough to repel, we began to extend and expand the Presidential office.

We have continued that straight along down the pathway of our history until to-day we have reached a point where Cabinet officers and politicians talk about the Administration policy as binding upon the American people. Not long ago a distinguished gentleman, for whose ability and character I have the profoundest respect, wrote a letter in which he outlined the Administration policy in the Philippines. My countrymen, my colleagues, regardless of what party is in power, regardless of all other questions, nothing can be more destructive to the perpetuity and safety of the American people than for the people to acquire the habit of acquiescing in the will of their masters. [Applause.] It is reversing the ancient constitutional order of things. The Constitution of the United States makes no mention of Cabinet officers. As a matter of fact, they are merely Presidential clerks to aid the President in the execution of the will of the American people as declared by the American Congress. No President, no Cabinet, no Administration, can constitutionally fix the status of the Philippine Islands toward the United States. No lawyer of any respectability believes that can be done. The question is, How long are the representatives in Congress of a free people charged with the duty of directing the Executive in the discharge of his duties under the Constitution to sit silent and acquiesce in whatever administration policy the Administration may see fit to promulgate?

I am not singling out this Administration; I have not one word to offer against any member of it. I am trying to discuss this question from the standpoint of an American and a Member of the American Congress, who owes his duty to the American people under his oath of office, which binds him to the Constitution of the United States. It is unnecessary to ask whether indifference on the part of the people or aggressive, steady grasping for power on the part of the President has produced a different situation; the fact is that it exists. There has grown up in this country a false idea subversive of fundamental principles, a reflection on the importance, the dignity, and the power of this House and the Senate as well, which has become almost universally accepted in the current press of the country, constantly referred to on the stump, and seeming to have the indorsement of many of the great officials of our past history, as well as our present. You hear talk now constantly of Administration policies, in the sense of the President and his Cabinet pursuing a certain course never directed by any legislative expression, and we are rapidly drifting into the practice of committing the Government insidiously and indirectly and unconstitutionally about this or that situation.

I would not detract from the full constitutional duty of the Presidential office to recommend legislation, and in every honorable way to further its accomplishment in the interest of the whole people, and, though a Democrat, with pleasure I commend that line of effort of the present Chief Executive of the nation to have just railroad rates, but it is of vital importance that this constitutional method be pursued with discrimination and strict attention to its limitation. No legislation has been enacted, no legislation has been sought, no legislation has been recommended which fixes, or which tends in declared purpose to fix definitely, the future status of the Philippine people. A great secretary gravely writes a letter declaring the Administration policy with reference to the Philippine question, and the terms of the letter, as well as the servile acquiescence on the part of Congress, seems to indicate that such an announcement is to settle the question, and that the people are expected to acquiesce in the administrative will, and by appropriations and other similar ways not only establish this administrative will by legislative acquiesence, but perhaps in the great court of international opinion estop the American people from declaring through Congress that will, which is in accord with their desires, and with the present equities of the situation I offer and feel no harsh criticism of this Administration for pursuing this course.

I will say no unkind word, and I feel none, toward Secretary Taft for having written such a letter. These and similar things are the evidences in our history for many years of the future and ultimate destructive policy of substituting for legislative expression of the people's will the views of the people's servants. It is but one of the many indications of the fatal tendency all along in our history for a President of the United States constantly to overstep the boundaries of Executive duties and seek to become the executor of a great estate whose owners sleep a sleep as profound as death. No man will contend that the power, under our Constitution, of settling this Philippine problem is lodged anywhere save in the Congress of the United States. A great Senator, not a member of my party, but a man of the highest order of ability, has stated in a breath the constitutional situation as follows:

> We have differed upon the Philippine question. Many Senators on the other side thought the United States ought not to have acquired the Philippines. There was fair ground for difference of opinion, probably, upon that proposition. I think there is no difference between the minority and the majority in this Chamber that we have acquired the Philippine Islands and that to-day the United States is titular sovereign of the Philippine Archipelago. What the people of the United States will choose in the long run to do with the Philippines, what the ultimate policy of the United States will be as to the Philippines, no man now can say. There has been no committal by Congress, and it is a matter entirely, under the Constitution, for Congress to determine as to the ultimate attitude of this country toward the Philippines.

So said Senator JOHN C. SPOONER March 17, 1905.

No Congressional enactment states what the will of the American people is on this subject. My colleagues, it is my deliberate belief that 95 per cent of the American people would vote for this resolution to-morrow if they got a chance; that 90 per cent of the voters in your district, regardless of party, would vote for it if they got a chance. We stand here afraid of the powers that be, afraid of this right-angled triangle order of things in which the hypothenuse is the White House, the base the Senate leaders, and the perpendicular the House leaders, and the square deals described on the hypothenuse are equal to the square deals of both the other two sides, still the system is wrong. I tell you the whole business ought not to be allowed to continue to the suppression of the American will on this great subject. Nor do I believe they want to. The expression of the President himself and the expression of two of the master minds of his Cabinet, and possibly of the country, Secretary Root and Secretary Taft, do say that ultimate independence is the solution of this Philippine problem. My judgment is, if Congress would declare this to be our ultimate purpose, to adopt some method by which it can be hastened and accomplished, that these same men will welcome any such programme.

Of course I am not authorized to speak for either one of these gentlemen; I am not on very close political relations with either of them. But some of you gentlemen are. Why not talk to them about it? Why not let us get together as Americans and attempt to do something to fix a definite basis upon which we may with safety proceed in all of our legislation touching the Philippine Islands? There is not a business man in the country but knows that ought to be done. There is not a legislator in the country but knows that ought to be done.

But there is another reason that appeals to me with the greatest force—why this sentence in the resolution which I have read ought to be adopted. I shall not to-day take the time to discuss all the old contentions between the two parties and among the two parties with reference to the rights of the brown man, and the consent of the governed, and the uplifting of the brown man in his religious life and the development of his country and the building of schools, and all that old straw.

Frankly, that never did worry me much. Frankly, I never have shed a tear and never expect to shed a tear about the brown Filipino. I believe that legislation, like charity, ought to begin at home, and let the rest take care of themselves. I am not especially concerned about that end of the thing, but I am concerned about what the effect on American institutions and American doctrines and American safety may be by reason of this or that action which we take there. And this brings me to this reason: I want to say to this House that there never has been a political doctrine asserted in the history of this country that has been so uniformly approved by every President and every Cabinet officer since its assertion as the doctrine known as the "Monroe doctrine." Not a single President from Monroe down but has either directly or indirectly given his approval to this doctrine. Not a Secretary of State—and we have had many distinguished men in that high office—but has either directly or indirectly given his approbation to the Monroe doctrine.

Perhaps the brightest jewel in the crown that decks the brow of one of the greatest living Democrats is the action of Grover Cleveland in the Venezuela controversy, when he stood for the Monroe doctrine though it might mean war. McKinley and Hay, Roosevelt and Root, Cleveland and Olney, and so on, all along down the line, our statesmen have approved this doctrine as essential to the vitality, to the perpetuity, to the safety of this American Republic. What is that doctrine? What is its scope and force? What does it say to the world? What do we stand for when we stand for the Monroe doctrine? I have seen no finer statement than this, from an editorial in the Washington Post of December 14 last:

> The Monroe doctrine—
> Says the editorial—
> was announced in response to a threat by a group of European nations, known as the "Holy Alliance," to aid Spain in recovering her revolted Spanish colonies. Monroe and Adams admitted fully the right of Spain to reestablish her authority over them, but Monroe made the following declaration in his message of December 2, 1823. Referring to the allied powers in Europe which had indicated a purpose of aiding Spain in the forcible recovery of her revolted colonies on this hemisphere, he said:
> "We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere; but with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European nation, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."
> This, and this only—
> Says the Post—
> is the Monroe doctrine.

I understand that the Monroe doctrine, in plain United States, as we would say it down in Texas, means this: We say to the world we will not permit European monarchies to acquire territory and exercise dominion over it in the Western Hemisphere, and that is all.

Now, it is true that a good deal of discussion has arisen as to the scope of the Monroe doctrine. Some great men have contended that it involves going further than merely saying this to Europe; that it involves the assertion of a protectorate over South American republics and the thrusting of our fingers into their internal affairs, dictating to them or restraining them from contracting debts and entering into treaties with foreign nations. I myself do not subscribe to any such extension of the Monroe doctrine as that. But that is immaterial in this discussion. For the purpose for which I use the doctrine it is immaterial how much you extend its scope toward a protectorate over the South American republics. The point is that all of us are agreed it is a Western Hemisphere doctrine. It has and can have no application to a single inch of territory a part of the Eastern Hemisphere.

Now, let us think a minute. Every session of Congress that goes by without an expression of the American people as to our ultimate will in the Philippines constitutes a menace to the vitality of the Monroe doctrine. Why? Because no man with sense can contend for America that Europe can not acquire territory on the Western Continent and exercise dominion over it, but that the United States can acquire and exercise dominion over territory in the Eastern Hemisphere. This doctrine has a reciprocity which constitutes the heart of the doctrine, the equity of it, the vitality of it, the force of it, and whenever you strike out that you ultimately whittle away the doctrine itself. When we promulgated that doctrine, accentuated it step by step in our history, we just as good as said to Europe, "We will not dabble in your affairs, and you shall not dabble in ours." Whenever we abandon that position we abandon the Monroe doctrine. This is not a Democratic idea, this is not a Republican idea, but I am presenting to you an American argument for the declaration of our purpose there, in consonance with our Monroe doctrine, in consonance with our Constitution, in consonance with our Declaration of Independence, and, as I verily believe, in consonance with the views of a vast majority of the American people.

Whether we ever adopt the rest of my resolution or not, whether a treaty neutralizing the islands and recognizing their independence can ever be negotiated or not, if we adopt this much of the resolution we shall at least proclaim an honorable position to the world, and we shall not mortgage the future with reference to the Philippines by doing it. I have only said that it is our preference to accomplish this purpose by setting up an independent government there. If that can not be done effectually and any door opens by which other righteous disposition may be made of the islands, it will be open to the American Congress to accept any such open door. For myself, I am frank to say that if the Japanese Government were to intimate even that they would like to have the Philippine Islands I would offer them to them as a Christmas present, provided they would enter into a treaty to protect certain rights of life and liberty and property there. I would be glad to turn the whole bunch of trouble over to them, who could handle them and work out their destiny better than we could under all the commissions that we should be able to organize. Now, then, so much for the declaration which is the basis of the method by which I propose to solve this question.

It will not do to adopt the scuttle policy; it will not do to turn the Philippine Islands loose, to sail away with our ships and soldiers and let chaos and anarchy reign there. Nobody with any sense could advocate that sort of procedure, but, why can not we do this; why can not we direct the President by this resolution to enter into negotiations with the governments of Europe to arrange a treaty by which these five things shall be fixed and agreed upon between this country and the signatory powers to the treaty.

First, that pending the accomplishment of this purpose and this preference of the United States expressed in the resolution, that the islands shall be neutralized; that when it has established its independence, it shall be recognized; that it shall agree to maintain toward the signatory powers when established, the open-door policy, and that it shall be neutral in the event of war involving any other signatory power, and that such concessions as may be made to the United States by the Philippine people in the establishment of this independent government shall be recognized and observed by the treaty.

Now, before I briefly discuss these five propositions, I wish to state the parliamentary history of this character of resolution in order that the House may see that I am offering nothing striking or novel in the history of our country. Even if this were a House resolution, as my original resolution introduced last winter was, I would be perfectly in accord with the early and continued precedents in this House.

On February 28, 1823, the House passed by a yea-and-nay vote of 131 yeas to 9 nays the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon and prosecute from time to time such negotiations with the Federal maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade and its ultimate denunciation as piracy under the laws of nations by the consent of the civilized world.

This resolution was offered in the House by Mr. Mercer, of Virginia. An examination of the debate in the House not only shows no objection to the method by any Member of the House, but a general recognition of the duty of Congress to declare the will of the people for the guidance of the Executive is observed in all the discussions; Mr. Wright, of Maryland, voicing that idea in these words:

Sir, this Congress ought to take upon themselves the responsibility of this measure by their positive opinion and leave it no longer a subject of doubt what is the will of the American people.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman when that resolution was offered.

Mr. BURGESS. 1823.

Mr. SULZER. Was it adopted?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes; by the overwhelming vote of 131 yeas to 9 nays. There were only 9 nays against it among the distinguished men that were Members of that House. Henry Clay was Speaker, and there were other big guns in the House. Webster and perhaps Calhoun—Webster certainly was there; I do not think he had then gone to the Senate.

On December 23, 1823, Mr. Livingston, of Louisiana, offered the House a resolution that—the President of the United States be requested to negotiate with the Government of Great Britain for the cession of so much land on the island of Abaco as may be necessary for the erection of light-houses, etc.

This was adopted without debate or objection. Henry Clay was Speaker; Daniel Webster and many great names in our history were Members. On May 16, 1826, on motion of Mr. Livingston, a resolution was agreed to that—the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any arrangement had been made with the Government of Great Britain in consequence of the resolution of this House of the 23d of December, 1823.

Verily, in those days the House asserted itself! In his message of December 3, 1833, President Jackson says:

I have the satisfaction to inform you that a negotiation which, by desire of the House of Representatives, was opened some years ago with the British Government for the erection of light-houses on the Bahamas has been successful.

On April 23, 1879, in this House, Mr. Fernando Wood offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to consider the expediency—

And from this I have borrowed the verbiage of my resolution—of entering into a convention with the Government of France for the negotiation of a treaty which shall secure a more equal interchange of the products and manufactures of each country and serve to cement closer relations of amity, trade, and commerce.

Many distinguished men were Members of this House, including such as Thomas B. Reed, W. P. FRYE, NELSON ALDRICH, both now Senators, Warner Miller, Frank Hiscock, Ben Butterworth, William McKinley, and the present Speaker of this House. The record shows no discussion, and the resolution was adopted without any dissenting vote of record.

Now, such in brief is the parliamentary history of this sort of matters in the House. I shall quote, not at length, from Senate Document No. 104, which is a reprint of an article by the senior Senator from the State of Massachusetts, dealing with the treaty-making powers of the Senate, a document which I recommend to every Member of the House, regardless of his politics, as affording one of the most interesting, clear, and accurate discussions of the office of the Senate with reference to treaty making that I have been able to find anywhere.

He cites numerous instances similar to the resolution which I now offer. For instance, on March 3, 1835, the Senate passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly of the governments of Central America and New Grenada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established, to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

On March 3, 1888, the Senate of the United States passed a resolution asking President Cleveland to open negotiations with China for the regulation of emigration from that country, and President Cleveland replied that such negotiations had been undertaken. So that so far as the parliamentary status of this resolution is concerned it is supported by the precedent both in the House and in the Senate without a break of nearly one hundred years. It is perfectly right and proper to instruct the President to open any negotiations which we conceive to be for the benefit of the American people.

Now, as to the treaty method proposed, it is my confident belief that such a treaty could be easily negotiated. Why? If we should resolve here that it is our ultimate purpose to get out of the Philippines and that it is our preference to get out by setting up an independent government there, protected by treaty with different powers, drawing about it the magic circle of peace in the interest of the people as well as the peace of the world, any one of the European powers would hesitate not to approve the treaty for fear if the treaty failed we might make other disposition of the islands, either to Japan or to Germany or to Russia or to England, and of course all the others would not like that and would not want that to be done.

So that an antagonism of interest between the powers would force an agreement to this method which would present a community of interests not only of Europe, not only of the United States, but of the civilized world. It would establish an open-door zone by treaty agreement between the powers of Europe and the United States. It would establish a peace zone where war could not enter. It would establish a peaceful opportunity without fear of outside molestation for independence to work itself out in the Philippine Islands. It would afford a fixed and definite relation upon which we could pitch all of our legislation so as to facilitate its accomplishment without involving any of our domestic institutions or theories. Nor do I take it that any European power would object either to neutralizing the islands or to preserving their independence when the government was set up by the United States. Nor would they object to its then agreeing to be neutral—to the open-door policy. Nor would they object, in my judgment, to such reasonable concessions being made to the people of the United States as the equities involved in our relation with them suggest. I think, for instance, that it would be entirely right and proper in the establishment of an independent government there for the Philippine people to make certain cessions to us as part of the enormous price in blood and treasure which we have expended to secure for them their independence.

I think no European government could or would object to such a provision as that. If they did, so far as I am concerned, rather than have the treaty fail and have the plan fail, I would freely give up any concession to us whatever and occupy precisely the same relation to them that any other government did which was a signatory power to the treaty. I am not willing for the United States to ever set up a protectorate over an independent government in the Philippine Islands. I shall never vote while I am a Member of Congress to expand the Monroe doctrine and then extend it across the Pacific and thrust it upon a European country. The doctrine of an American protectorate over any sort of a government in the Eastern Hemisphere is, to my mind, utterly unstatesmanlike, utterly unbusinesslike, contrary to all our traditions and principles, and fraught with infinite danger to the American people. I would rather hold the Philippines in tutelage for years and years and years, aye, for centuries, than to give them an independent government under an American protectorate. That is worse than a European alliance, because with an alliance there is reciprocity, but with a protectorate you are responsible for all they do, and they are responsible neither to you nor anybody else. But if we should have them hedged about by a treaty all these difficulties would disappear as if by magic.

Nor is this idea any novel invention. It is not a new thing in the procedure of the nations of the earth. The history of the little Republic of Switzerland, lying nestled in the lap of the European powers for seventy-five years, is a vindication of the value to the world and the peace of the people of such a treaty agreement as this. Switzerland is the most advanced republic on the face of the earth to-day, and it draws its life, imbibes its progress, has made its mighty evolution under an agreement of the powers to preserve and conserve its neutrality and its independence. We can do the same thing in the Philippines. All we have to do is to have the courage of freeborn American citizens and vote like we believe and it will be done.

Now, in conclusion I wish to read an editorial in the Washington Post, which I do think throws cold water on me in the cleverest, sweetest way I ever had that done to me in my life. On December 21, shortly after this resolution had been introduced, the Washington Post published an editorial which is as follows:

MR. BURGESS'S VISION.

Mr. BURGESS, of Texas, expresses a happy thought in House joint resolution No. 44, thus described in the official document: "Requesting the President to consider the expediency of effecting a treaty with European powers providing for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands and to protect an independent government there when established."

It begins and it will end in a thought, so far as concerns the existing dispensation, we feel very sure; but what a bright vista of encouragement it opens through the clouds that now obscure the prospect! We do not want the Philippines. We do not need them in our business. The possession is an incumbrance, a constant care, a bunghole of waste, a distributing center of embarrassment and peril. Leave out the officials who thrive upon the harvest of salary and power—and their name is that of the swarm of Kansas grasshoppers—what thoughtful American citizen wishes to keep the Philippines and to have his country entangled in its destinies?

Mr. BURGESS's proposition is ideal. To realize it would be to undo a world of follies and futilities, to unload an innumerable legion of grafts and barnacles, to remove the United States from a sphere of unprofitable danger and insane adventure. But it it is too beautiful to live. Mr. BURGESS is a fine fellow, but he is a poet and a dreamer.

My countrymen, my colleagues in this House, whether this matter is a dream or a vision or is made a real business-working reality, is not dependent upon me, but it is dependent upon the will of this House. Will the membership of this House have the courage to express their honest convictions about it? Will they for once forget the power that may operate from this or that source? Will they for once bend down to the earth, consecrated by the blood of the bravest and best, and catch an American inspiration and vote like American citizens for the preservation and perpetuity and safety, not only of the American Republic, not only of the Philippines people, but take a great step toward the open-door policy, toward arbitration, toward peace by treaty everywhere on earth? [Applause.] This resolution is practical. It is common sense. There is no party policy involved in it. There is no reason why it should not pass, and I do hope that the membership of this House will take hold of it in the spirit in which it is offered. Think of it, and if you believe it is wise and right, vote for it in obedience to the situation and the desire to benefit the American people and the Filipino people.

No war could threaten the peace of the Filipino while he was working out his destiny nor threaten the safety of the American Republic while they are aiding him to do it. No war with any European power could affect the status which we bear toward them under this resolution or which they bear to the world. If there ever can be an independent government set up there it can be quicker and better done under this sort of a treaty, and all of you know it, than it ever could be done otherwise. Now, I ask you one question. I leave it with your conscience and then I am through. Can you give me one single, good, honest reason why this resolution should not be adopted? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of saying anything upon this bill, because I was confident that my views upon it would be amply and ably expressed by others, until last evening, when my colleague from Massachusetts made some criticisms upon the attitude of the Massachusetts Republicans. I am aware that criticisms upon us have come not only from that side of the House, but also from the Republican side, and while we, of course, expect and, I hope, deserve criticism from the Democratic side, for if we did not I would be very sure we were derelict to our principles, yet I do not desire and I do not think we deserve criticism from this side. The position the Republicans of Massachusetts have taken on revision is very simple. It is the old Republican doctrine that no tariff is sacred, that time always makes changes, and we thought in the last eight years there have been such extraordinary inventions, so much improvement in methods of production and distribution, that it was theoretically fair to presume there must be need of change; and when that was brought home to us in particular instances we thought it was good Republican doctrine and good common sense that we should now have the tariff revised.

But my colleague yesterday intimated that we held a very difficult position here in trying, as he said, to steer between the Charybdis of home popularity and the Scylla of the Speaker's wishes. Now, for myself, with the utmost respect and consideration for the Speaker, I do not think I am excessively anxious to always be in accord with him, but I admit that I am always anxious, and particularly on a question like this, to be in accord with the majority of this side of the House. That I trust will always be my position; and I do not intend, as I never have, to be tempted by any Democratic alliance to go counter to the views of the majority of the Republican party, for I am very confident that any such alliance, founded as it must be upon entirely different motives and different principles, would in the end be unsatisfactory to both parties. Consequently my personal intention is to abide by the decision of the majority of the Republicans of this House; but I do not wish that majority to misunderstand or misinterpret our position.

I think my colleagues from Massachusetts on the Democratic side have a much more difficult task than we to keep at once popularity with their constituents and popularity with their colleagues here. What is the Democratic argument at home? It is free raw materials. That for years has been the Democratic contention.

Is that the position of the Democratic party in this House? Is that the position of their dominant faction? Why, the Democrat who spoke last on this subject before my colleague made this remark:

> There is just about as much justice in that proposition as there is in the proposition to tax the people of Kentucky to maintain manufacturing institutions in the New England States.

That is the ordinary Democratic doctrine which we hear in this House. It is not free raw materials—that is not Democratic doctrine—but it is a reduction of the tariff. And yet my Democratic colleagues go home to Massachusetts and argue to their constituents there for free raw materials and allow it to be understood that the Democratic doctrine is to keep up the protection of our industries so that they may flourish as well as ever, but to give this additional boon of free raw materials which the Republicans are denying to them. Now, you see that is a difficult proposition for us to face, because every constituency, every State, is more or less selfish—all are looking for their own advantage. And Massachusetts just at this time is perhaps in a peculiarly delicate condition, because the great industries that have been built up there we see gradually deserting us; we see that the West and the South are becoming rivals, and year by year we see industry after industry going away, and we have got to do something to fill their places.

Massachusetts, you know, was not originally friendly to protection. Massachusetts, when protection was first suggested, fought it vigorously, because, moved by the same selfish interest which, as I say, influences all communities, they felt that their source of wealth was the sea. They felt that with our location and our harbors the sea was our natural source of wealth. We had our shipyards and we were beginning to build the clipper ships, distancing the world, and whitening all the seas with the American commerce, and we felt that freer trade meant more trade, and a protective tariff would tend to stifle trade and so tend to injure us; and therefore Massachusetts originally opposed protection. But when it was forced upon her, with Yankee ingenuity she built up her manufacturing industries and her ocean trade languished, until now it is her great manufacturing industries that make the wealth of the people. Therefore she is to-day for protection, and therefore to-day you will not be surprised that when she sees rivals growing up all over the United States, when she sees that the natural law which brings the manufacturer as near as possible to the raw material is drawing away from her the great wealth that she has acquired, and that the capital which has been a great advantage is now being accumulated in the West and South, she must strain every nerve to do what she can to maintain her industries.

Therefore, when Democratic orators go to her and say, "We will give you free raw materials, and then you can compete with the other Western and Southern States, which have the raw materials close by them," is it any wonder that such ingenious and disingenuous arguments lead many thoughtless Republicans to disregard the fact that these claims will never be substantiated by any Democratic legislation in this House and to crave and work for this alluring Democratic doctrine? Do you not see that this theory of free raw materials, so attractive to any manufacturing State, naturally will have the effect of undermining Republican principles and reducing our majority?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman if, given an opportunity himself, he would support and vote for a proposition for free hides?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And for free coal?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And free lumber?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That I am doubtful about.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And free wood pulp?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That I am doubtful about.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And for a substantial reduction on the products of steel?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That does not affect Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. So far as the gentleman's answers go, then, he stands on the same platform that the Democrats of Massachusetts stood on in the last election.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But, Mr. Chairman, my reasons are very different. Why do we favor free hides and free coal? Because we say that free hides and free coal are both of them in strict accord with the principles of protection on which we stand. They are not like free wool, for instance, which I suppose the gentleman will advocate. They are not brought in competition here with any other American industry. I claim that one American industry is just as much entitled to protection as any other, and I contend that if they want it they shall all have it. But talking about free hides, I do not believe that the protective duty on hides gives any protection to the American farmer. It is a mere by-product. If it could be proved that a duty on hides was a protective duty for the benefit of the farmer, I would not argue to strike it out. I am not asking for ourselves anything that I would deny to any other portion of the country. The duty on hides is not protective, and the repeal of that duty would assist our industries; and if so, then I will do the utmost in my power to favor a repeal of that duty on hides, because it is not in violation of the protective principle.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman to answer why the duty upon hides is not a protective duty, why a duty upon coal is not a protective duty equally with the products of steel, for example.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not think the duty on hides has had the slightest effect upon the price of the article to the farmer. It does not protect him at all, and therefore it is not a protective tariff and is not needed. Now, as to coal, we would export as much as we would import. It would be a matter that might affect different localities, but it would be a mere matter of exchange.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The farmer who sells the beef from which the hide is taken certainly has some voice in fixing the price of the article which he sells. Now, will the gentleman tell the House what agency exists which defeats the intention of the duty upon hides, namely, the intention to make it a protective duty in fact?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As I have already said, it is because the hide is a by-product, and the tariff on hides, in my opinion, makes no difference to the producer.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I want the gentleman to explain why it does not.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Because it is a by-product.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is not the hide of the beef sold with the rest of the beef?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, yes; but it is so small compared with the rest of the whole product that it does not enter into the price in such a way as to make a difference in it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think the farmer pays no attention to the value of the hide when he sells the whole beef? Is not that a part of the transaction?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not suppose he thinks of the value of the hide when he sells it, although I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that I have no doubt that the farmers of the country generally do believe that the tariff on hides increases the value of their sale and I have no doubt that is one reason why so many Members of this House favor the retention of the duty.

Mr. LACEY. I would ask my friend from Massachusetts whether he regards the porterhouse steak as a by-product of the beef also?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, no; of course not.

Mr. LACEY. It is much less than the hide.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not see the parallelism.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask my friend another question——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know whether my friend is intending to be humorous or not.

Mr. LACEY. No; I am serious about it, representing, as I do, a locality that is interested in producing beef, and where the hide is a finished product. Now, as to the actual addition to the cost of a pair of shoes. The gentleman comes from a shoemaking district. I will ask him, how much does the tariff figure on a pair of ordinary farm shoes?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I suppose it makes a difference of from 2 to 5 cents in the cost.

Mr. LACEY. In the actual cost to the manufacturer does it exceed more than 3 or 4 cents?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No, I think not. I think myself that the value of free hides is very much exaggerated in the opinion of the people of Massachusetts. I do not think it would be of any such large importance to them as they think it would; but they have been brought to believe that it would very largely increase the prosperity of the shoe and leather industry.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask the gentleman, if the tariff on hides does not affect the price, what difference does it make to the shoe manufacturers whether it is taken off or not?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, it might make a difference in the price of hides that come in. As I said, I think it would be very much less than is supposed.

Mr. STERLING. It would reduce the market price that much to the western farmers, then, would it not?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It might reduce it some fraction of that, but I do not think it affects the farmer.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is not aware that his colleague on his side of the House [Mr. LAWRENCE], in his speech the other day, quoted with approval the statement of a Democratic governor of Massachusetts that the duty upon hides increased the cost of shoes about 6 cents per pair?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I did not see that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman, further, if he is willing to answer (and if not I will suspend at any moment), whether it has not been the intervention of the beef trust between the farmer and the consumer, and the intervention of the coal trust between the coal miner and the ultimate purchaser, that have increased the prices of those articles to the consuming public?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have no doubt they have largely done so; yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that the beef trust has been organized since the Dingley bill was passed in 1897?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I think that was organized before that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is mistaken about the beef trust; I think it is since 1897.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know whether the present organization existed before that or not, but there was practically a combination which was effective. It is being perfected from year to year.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. At all events, the fact that there was a tariff on coal and beef which competed with the products of these trusts was the factor which enabled these trusts to keep up the prices of the articles they sold in the United States?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Now, the gentleman is going into the old trust question.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Did I not understand the gentleman some time ago to say that the 15 per cent duty on hides operated to increase the price of hides imported into the United States?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Very possibly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Would not the same be true of coal?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then the fact is that the duties upon hides and coal have operated to increase the price of coal and hides to the consumer in the United States?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It has increased the price—yes, it has increased it to the consumer.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. There was one year in which the duty was taken off from coal?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Can the gentleman tell us how much coal was brought into the country while that duty was off?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I can not; as I remember, it made no difference.

Mr. POWERS. Was it not a mere bagatelle?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think there was very little.

Mr. POWERS. Now, let me ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That duty was taken off from coal at the request of Massachusetts.

Mr. POWERS. Yes. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, does the gentleman propose to introduce a bill taking the duty off from hides alone?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I have introduced no bill.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman think it would be wise——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think various bills have been introduced.

Mr. POWERS. There has been no bill reported from the committee, but does the gentleman think it would be wise to pass such a bill?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I personally would be glad to see it done.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman not think that any revision of the tariff on hides would open up a general revision if such a bill was brought in here, and does not the gentleman think that any revision of the tariff would leave Massachusetts in a position worse than she is to-day?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have great fear that it would, and still I would be willing to take that risk. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I believe it is not on the products of the farmer, but upon other manufactured articles that changes in the tariff should be made—that we should change the duty. I think that the hide is a part of the product of the farm, and that the duty upon it has raised the value considerably to the farmer, and that he should have it. Why should he not have it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is where I differ with the gentleman from Maine. I do not believe the farmer gets any more for his hides than if there was no duty on them.

Mr. POWERS. The only reason I ever heard given for taking the duty off of hides is that hides are largely used in Massachusetts for the manufacture of boots and shoes and is a product that Massachusetts does not produce, and therefore the duty should be taken off. Is that the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Maine knows that it is not. I have stated my position. I think it raises the price to the consumer, but it does not raise the price for the original producer—the farmer.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I simply want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Chairman, that I happen to be a farmer, and I allow some cattle to grow up on the farm. I sell half a dozen steers a year. My accounts show that I used to be allowed from $1.90 to $2.20 for a hide. I noticed the other day that I had not been allowed less than $3.50 for a hide for the last three or four years. If it is not the duty that has raised the price, what is it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Is that any more of a rise than other parts of the cattle have risen in the same time?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Very much greater.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have believed and I do believe that while the price is raised to the consumer it is not the farmer who gets the benefit of it; it is the middleman.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Well, I have got that dollar and a half on each hide, and I want to know who pays for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. If that comes from the duty of 15 per cent, then the gentleman certainly does get it, and if I am convinced of that fact I will not object, nor shall I raise my voice for free hides, for I recognize that the farmer, if he gets the benefit of it, is just as much entitled to it as we are to our manufactured articles; but I have believed that the farmer did not get the benefit of it; that it was all absorbed by the middleman, the trust; that we, as consumers, have to pay more, and that it was not of the slightest advantage to the people for whom the tariff was put on. I may of course be mistaken about that. I do not pretend to any original knowledge or experience.

Mr. HINSHAW. How much does the gentleman estimate there would be an advantage in the price of a pair of shoes from a factory in Massachusetts by having hides put on the free list?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Personally I doubt if there would be any difference to the consumer.

Mr. HINSHAW. Who would get the benefit of the reduction in the duty on hides?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The manufacturer.

Mr. HINSHAW. Upon whom, therefore, would the loss fall? Would it not fall on the farmer?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It would be on whoever gets it. If the farmer gets it, which, as I say, I do not believe—that, of course, is the foundation of my argument, that I do not believe the farmer is getting the advance of the duty on hides, but I say frankly if he is I think it ought not to be taken off.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the Republican tariff reformers in Massachusetts, in order to secure free hides, are willing to take the tariff off boots, shoes, harness, and the other product of leather either wholly or in proportion?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As to that I understand there is a difference of opinion. I understand that about 50 per cent of the manufacturers of boots and shoes think that they could get on without the present tariff if they had free hides. I understand that the other 50 per cent think they could not go on without the tariff; that if they did other competition, largely Canadian, would beat them.

Mr. McNARY. Does the gentleman seriously contend here before this House that 50 per cent of the Massachusetts manufacturers of boots and shoes feel that they need the tariff on that article to protect them from Canada?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is what I understand.

Mr. McNARY. So far as I have been able to ascertain the opinion of any manufacturer in Massachusetts, and acting upon that opinion, every one of them that I have known is perfectly willing to take the duty off boots and shoes if the duty is taken off hides, and are perfectly willing to meet competition from Canada or any other nation, and believe that if the duty is taken off hides not only would they be able to meet Canadian competition, but to flood the markets with their products, if we have raw materials. I think the gentleman is entirely wrong in respect to his opinion of the manufacturers of Massachusetts.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McNARY] mean the duty on hides or leather?

Mr. McNARY. I mean hides and leather.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I did not yield to allow the gentleman to make a long statement.

Mr. McNARY. I am not going to make any statement, but acting upon the idea which is contrary to the idea of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], I have introduced a bill here to take the duty off not only hides, but off boots and shoes, harness and leather of all descriptions, and in that I am backed up by the sentiment of many of the manufacturers of Massachusetts. And I would like to ask the gentleman right now, if he represents the views of the manufacturers of Massachusetts and the people interested in that industry, whether or not he will vote with me for a bill to take off the duty not only on hides, but on boots and shoes and every other article of leather manufactured in our State?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to be a representative of the manufacturers of Massachusetts, as the gentleman does. I am representing nobody but my own opinion, and I will say I will not vote for the bill which the gentleman has introduced.

Mr. McNARY. Allow me to ask whether or not the gentleman believes his colleagues on that side of the House will vote any bill taking duties off any article, either hides, leather, or boots or shoes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I did not catch the first part of the gentleman's question.

Mr. McNARY. Allow me to ask you whether or not you believe the gentlemen on that side of the House will report any bill to this House taking the duties off hides, boots or shoes, or any other article of leather if we concede we are willing to take the duties off everything?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am not a prophet, and I can not speak of what this side will do. What they will do on that side of the House if they have to construct a tariff bill——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a free trader?

Mr. McNARY. Who said so?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I heard you make free-trade speeches.

Mr. McNARY. Where did you hear me?

Mr. MANN. Are you?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think I had better resume the floor.

Mr. McNARY. When I have the floor I will state my position, to my own satisfaction if not to yours.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, let me restate what I say. I am not sure about this duty on hides, whether it really goes to the farmer or not. I do not believe it does, from what I am told; and if it does not, and this is the foundation of my argument—if it goes to the middleman—I think it ought to come off.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman tell the House that the farmer is entitled to protection and that the middleman is not?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The middleman at the present time is the beef trust, and I do not care to add protection to them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then the gentleman makes a distinction as to what men are entitled to protection according to the business they are engaged in?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. When there is a large trust like that I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman willing to vote with the Democrats to take off duties where the benefit goes only to the trusts in other matters?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It is dependent upon the trust, of course. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I will let it go at that.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if there is a trust which monopolizes the business of the country, I believe they are not entitled to our consideration; but if it is a trust, as there are so many of them, which has competition right here at home, then I think, of course, it is like anyone else. It is dependent upon whether they have a monopoly or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman say to the steel trust?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am not going into the details of the different trusts.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman knows there has been a report made to this House by his own colleague showing the steel trust is selling its products at greatly reduced prices abroad, and that one of the reasons of our stagnation in shipbuilding is because of the exorbitant prices they are asking now. Will the gentleman join with us to hit the steel trust?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to—and the gentleman can very well see the reason—state just where that tariff revision ought to come and where not, because if I say what exact article or businesses I think can stand reduction, of course it follows that anybody who favors them is not going to join with me. So I advocate simply a general revision, and I am willing to go into the Republican caucus and abide by its result, and I am not willing to enter into any alliance with the Democratic party on any of these propositions, for I know very well what that means. We have all the experience of what Democratic legislation means on this subject. In fact, that is the one sure source of hope in the future of the Republican party in Massachusetts. Against these ingenious assaults we know there is one remedy which we can always depend upon to bring people back to their senses, and that is Democratic success. [Applause on the Republican side.] We know very well if once the Democratic party has power the Democrats and Republicans of Massachusetts alike will see how impotent in the Democratic House their Democratic Representatives are. They will see how little their interests are considered there, and that is sure to bring a general revulsion to the Republican party.

We all remember the experience of twelve years ago. The Democratic party in Massachusetts, on exactly this same issue, free raw materials, when I first ran for Congress was in control of the State. They had elected the governor for three years, one year a Presidential year, and they had seven out of twelve Representatives in this House. What has changed it? Why is it that since then the Democrats have never been able to elect more than four out of thirteen Congressmen? Because there was elected a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President, and a Democratic tariff bill was enacted, and from that time there was no doubt of the action of Massachusetts until their memories began to forsake them. Now, I do not believe their memories will forsake them long. I think they will remember what happened then, and although they may be discontented, as they are discontented to-day under the pressure of competition, and although they may ascribe their fears to our legislation, yet when the critical time comes and they remember what the alternative is, I do not think they will permanently leave us.

I remember that when King Charles the Second was on the throne, his brother James, who was his heir and the most unpopular man in the country, one day said to him: "Charles, you ought not to expose yourself so freely to the public; you will be assassinated;" that the witty monarch turned to him and said, "Jamie, they will never kill me to make you king." [Laughter.] So I think the Republicans of Massachusetts, discontented as they may be with us, when they recollect what the alternative is will not destroy us to put you permanently into power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him two questions?

Mr GILLETT of Massachusetts. One at a time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right. Now, if taking the duty off of hides is not going to reduce the price of shoes and boots, and so forth, made of leather, to the consumer, as you stated some minutes ago, it was not——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Now, let me say right there I do not pretend to be an authority on that. Some say it will and some say it will not. Personally I do not believe it will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is not going to reduce the price of boots and shoes and harness and other articles made of leather, then what inducement to anybody in this House, except the man in Massachusetts, to vote for free hides? [Democratic applause.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. They think in Massachusetts, of course, that it will. A great many people claim that it will, and Massachusetts is not the only home of such manufactures.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask another question. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he indorses this statement from Governor Guild. This is in his letter to President Roosevelt:

> The Republican ticket, in my judgment, would have been overwhelmingly defeated if our platform, on which both Mr. Draper and I stood, had not contained the plank indorsing the position taken last spring by our delegation in Congress in favor of immediate tariff revision.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I was not at home in the last campaign. I was, with many others, trying to get information as to how to vote on this bill in the Philippines, and therefore I took no part in the campaign, and I can not tell whether that was a fact or not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will not ask the gentleman where he was last summer or when King Charles the Second was on the throne, but I will ask him whether at this minute he indorses that statement made by Governor Guild in his letter to President Roosevelt?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I do not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then the house is divided against itself in Republican Massachusetts?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; there is a great difference of opinion.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. McNARY. I would like to ask the gentleman two questions. I would like to ask him, first, whether it is not true that the Republican Members of Congress from Massachusetts voted with their Republican colleagues to put the duty on hides?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We voted for the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Now, I would like to ask——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We did all we could before it came to a vote, but when it came to a vote we voted—I did, at least, and I think all my colleagues did—in favor of the tariff bill which included the duty on hides. We bowed, as I always intend to do, to the rule of the majority of the Republican party, and therefore I voted for a great many things, I have no doubt, in that tariff which I did not approve; and I have no doubt that every Democrat here who was present when the Wilson bill was passed did the same.

Mr. McNARY. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question. I would like to ask him if, when the question of tariff reduction comes before a Republican caucus or comes as a result of a Republican caucus into this House, whether or not he or his colleagues from Massachusetts, if the Republican caucus decides that duty must be taken off of hides, will vote with them to keep it on?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will tell you squarely that if that comes in as a Republican caucus measure I shall vote for whatever the Republican caucus decides. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] I speak for myself and not for my colleagues. I do not know what they would do. We all understand that there is no tariff bill that suits every Member. Every tariff bill is a compromise, where there are a great many items we do not like, yet we vote for it. Whatever the Republican party decides I shall stand by.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will permit me, this tariff on hides that is now the subject of discussion was put there in the Dingley bill, as I understand.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can you state the magnitude of the production of boots and shoes of the United States for the year of the Dingley bill, and a comparison with each year since?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; I do not carry these figures in my head.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will ask you if the foreign trade in American manufactured boots and shoes has not increased every year, and was it not this last year more than double what it was in the year prior to the Dingley bill?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It has certainly increased prodigiously, but I do not know just the proportion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But of course all gentlemen know that when you bring about the production of vast quantities of manufactured goods the manufacturers would not do it unless they were making money.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. They are making money on them, but of course the gentleman sees this—every business man wants to do everything he can to increase his business. It is the same everywhere. If there is brought to them a proposition which they think does increase their business, why of course they are going to welcome it no matter whether their business flourished before or decayed.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman another question following out the question of the gentleman from Ohio. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts believe that the tax upon hides helped to increase the export of boots and shoes from the United States to Europe?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Of course I do not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman believe that it was the prosperity existing and growing out of the repeal of the Wilson bill and the passage of the Dingley bill that did it? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not pretend that I am at all an expert in this matter of hides, boots, and shoes. I am sorry that some Member who has studied it more than I is not representing that industry, so that he can bring the exact figures forward. I simply referred to hides as one of the arguments that have been brought forward in Massachusetts by the Democrats as a free raw material. The whole free-raw-material doctrine, of which this is only an incident, is being advocated by Democrats in one part of the country and not in other parts. You all know that if the Democratic party came into power that doctrine would receive no countenance from them and that the duties they would be most eager and determined to reduce would be not on the raw material, but on the manufactured product; and yet in our State they still succeed in holding it out as Democratic doctrine and offer it as an alluring and often a successful bribe.

There is one other question much discussed in Massachusetts—Canadian reciprocity. On that issue I go further than many of the Democrats. I would myself be glad to see absolute free trade between the United States and Canada. [Applause.] I believe that in the first place the United States would be most benefited by it. I believe that our industries are so organized and capitalized and perfected that they could invade Canada, and that despite the cheaper labor there now we would gain very much more than she. It would, of course, temporarily disarrange business and cause some suffering, but I believe we would ultimately profit largely from it. I do not think she could successfully compete with our capital and organization and industrial energy. I believe also it would help us in our relations with Canada. I never favored the annexation of our tropical possessions. I always opposed it, thinking it would be expensive and troublesome for us, and my opinions have never changed, and I know of no land south of us which I should like to be ours; but I would like to see Canada part of the United States. It is the only portion of the world I covet.

But I fear it is now too late, that the spirit of nationality has developed there, and that it is no longer possible for us ever to unite with that splendid domain, whose people are so akin to us. But I think we should do all we can to cultivate intimate relations with her, and become as close to her as possible. I think that free trade with Canada would tend to that result, and for that reason, too, I favor it. To my mind the greatest crime that the Democratic party ever committed was when they went through a Presidential campaign with the bold and taking cry, "Fifty-four forty or fight," and then after they had won the campaign had neither the courage to fight nor the foresight to keep "fifty-four forty." We never can repeat that mistake. That was the one chance when we might have owned that whole Pacific coast and acquired all that splendid northwest section of Canada.

But the time may possibly come again, if we cultivate warm relations with Canada, when we may have the opportunity to be united, and that, it seems to me, is an ambition that we might well keep before our eyes. For these two reasons, because I think in the long run it would advantage us in the matter of trade, and because also I think it would increase our friendly relations and might sometime bring us to a closer union—for these two reasons I ardently favor Canadian reciprocity, although I admit that at present there is but the faintest possibility that Canada would enter into any substantial reciprocal treaty.

There was one other sentence which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] used in his speech yesterday to which I wish to refer. He said that the great export trade which we have built up under the Dingley tariff was not the best gauge of the prosperity of the country. I think he depreciated the value of that great excess of exports over imports. I think he did not appreciate that those hundreds of millions of dollars that every year we have been sending over there beyond what we took back were paying back the vast amounts of capital which have come to the United States from foreign countries, which had helped to start us in our development, which built our railroads, which founded our great institutions, which accelerated our prosperity.

I think those hundreds of millions of dollars that we have annually sent over there have made America owned by Americans. We have been paying off our debts, and that is significant and valuable. But I agree with my colleague [Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts] when he says it is not the greatest test of our prosperity, and I agree with this sentence, expressed with his usual felicity:

> No, it is not the excess of our exports that gauges our national prosperity, but the great volume of commercial transactions that are absolutely unrestricted by tariff in the forty-five States and four Territories of this Union.

I applauded that sentence. I agree with the statement contained in it, that the great thermometer of our prosperity is our magnificient internal commerce. And it is that great internal commerce that the Republican party proposes to keep for Americans. It is protection that keeps it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We will build a wall around it and keep that prosperity for ourselves, and it seems to me that when he said that he at once admitted the value of a Republican tariff. He admitted that that is the best prosperity we can have, and is it not worth while to put a wall around it and make it dead sure that we shall have it? I think the wall is in places unnecessarily high, and I think where it is we had better lower it, but I do not believe it is wise to topple the wall over because here and there it is too high. Let us correct irregularities, never forgetting our main purpose.

Mr. CASSEL rose and was recognized.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASSEL]. I have no objection to this debate going on to a reasonable length, but I think we ought to get back to the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor, if he insists upon it.

Mr. HINSHAW. Only a question. Free trade between Canada and the United States would result, would it not, in the importation of many food products from Canada into the United States?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly it would at first.

Mr. HINSHAW. And would they not come in competition with the food products from the Mississippi and Missouri valleys, by reason of the fact that the distance is so much less between Canada and Massachusetts than between Nebraska, for instance, and Massachusetts?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not think it is. I do not think the food products are principally grown in the eastern part of Canada.

Mr. HINSHAW. I so understand. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts wherein Massachusetts is benefited by free trade with Canada?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am not advocating it for that reason, but on national grounds. But I presume the argument which especially appeals to Massachusetts is that, feeling her trade going away from her and seeing this big market of Canada right there at her doors, she hopes that by freer trade she might get a larger and advantageous trade. I think that is the prevalent reason.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Chairman, I shall discuss for a short time this afternoon what I think will be the effect of the pending Philippine tariff bill upon the interests of the tobacco growers and manufacturers throughout the United States, but more especially its effect upon such interests in my own district, which lies wholly within the great tobacco-producing county of Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania.

During the discussion of this question two statements have been made by the friends of the bill that should be contradicted with the utmost emphasis. On the one hand, it has been argued that the United States should open its markets to Philippine tobacco and its products for the reason that the transfer of sovereignty has resulted in the loss of the Spanish markets. The other statement, which was repeated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in the course of his remarks in the House on the 6th instant, was to the effect that in the last few years there had been a heavy falling off in the exports of cigars. His table of exports is as follows:

With regard to the Spanish market, it is only necessary to refer to the latest available figures to be found in the Monthly Summary of the Commerce of the Philippine Islands for the fiscal year 1905, issued by the Bureau of Insular Affairs, to show that Spain is not only by far the largest customer the Philippine Islands have for their leaf, but that her takings of this leaf have increased during the past two years. In 1904, for example, the total exports of leaf tobacco from the Philippines aggregated 19,044,290 pounds, of which Spain took 13,073,021 pounds. In 1905, when the total exports were 16,276,266 pounds, Spain imported 13,455,065. It thus appears that not only was the Spanish import of Philippine tobacco actually larger in the fiscal year 1905 than in 1904, but it was proportionately very much greater. It is an interesting fact in this connection that the total value of the Spanish imports of Philippine leaf in 1905 increased fully 30 per cent.

The gentleman from Connecticut, in his effort to show a depressed condition in the cigar industry of the islands, referred to the exports of 1902 as though they were of normal proportions, and sought to convey the impression that there has since been a steady downward tendency. As a matter of fact, the exports of 1902, which aggregated $1,666,722, were larger than for many years previously and were in all respects abnormal. In 1903 the shipments again resumed normal proportions, aggregating $947,504. Since that year there has been a steady increase, the exports in 1904 aggregating $968,869, and in 1905, $971,177.

It is significant in this connection to quote the figures compiled by the Bureau of Insular Affairs showing the five-year annual average for the quinquennial periods ending with 1894—before American occupation—and 1904, after the islands passed into the possession of the United States. The average annual value of the exports of cigars, cigarettes, and all other manufactured tobacco for the five-year period ending 1894 was but $972,805, while for the corresponding period ending with 1904 the average annual value was $1,228,019, an increase of nearly one-third. These figures will be found on page 623 of the Monthly Summary of Commerce of the Philippine Islands for December, 1904.

In this connection, it should be stated that there has been much juggling of the tobacco-export figures with respect to the distribution of leaf and cigars in the Orient. The fact should be borne in mind that up to 1900 all exports intended for Hongkong were credited to the British East Indies, while from 1888 to 1894 they were credited to China. It is not practicable to state the countries constituting the ultimate destinations of these shipments for the reason that Hongkong is a distributing point from which merchandise of all kinds is sent to nearly all the countries of the world.

The Philippine Islands contain 73,345,415 acres, of which, we are told, 68,405,415 acres and over are public lands. One-half of the latter, or about 33,000,000 acres, according to Governor Taft, may be converted by irrigation into good agricultural lands. Governor Taft, before a committee of Congress, said that we (meaning the Philippine Archipelago) have resources for a large population, and compared with Japan and Java, the Philippines are a little less in area than Japan, but they have much more arable land and much more rich soil.

The Philippine Islands are an acquisition of the United States. I must differ with the gentlemen who have discussed this question when they say that they are a Territory of the United States. They are not a Territory in the sense that we refer to Arizona or any of our other Territories. The people of the Philippine Islands are wards of the United States. We have taken them and we hold them as wards until we are able to give them their independence. Now, we will all agree that it is not the duty of the guardian to take money from his own pocket and place it in the hands of the ward, but it is his duty to utilize the property of the ward and to see that it is properly administered.

In discussing this question the honored chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, when we talked to him about the tobacco question, with a wave of his hand dismissed the whole subject and said, "There is nothing in it." I am sorry indeed to differ with him and with the report of the Republican majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, but representing as I do a district which is engaged in raising tobacco upon 5,000 farms, utilizing about 20,000 acres of land, employing about 10,000 people in planting, caring for, harvesting, and marketing the crop—a district producing annually between twenty-four and twenty-five million pounds of tobacco, which sells at a price which nets the farmer between $2,750,000 and $3,000,000; a district having invested in tobacco buildings over $15,000,000; a district which in 1904 produced 64,000,000 cigars, which yielded to the Government a revenue of two and a half million dollars, and which has 2,461 cigar factories, employing over 20,000 people—I should be recreant to my duty and misrepresent my constituents if I did not vote against this bill.

I have here in my hand the protest of these tobacco growers, which I will read:

The undersigned tobacco growers of Lancaster County, impressed with the danger that threatens the tobacco industry of the country from the introduction of Philippine cigars and tobacco at reduced tariff rates, as has been proposed, do most earnestly protest against such action by the Congress of the United States. Owing to our dearer lands and the higher cost of producing our domestic tobacco we are positive that such action would prove ruinous to our home industry, and we therefore appeal to the Ways and Means Committee and to the Members of Congress to prevent, by their action and votes, the possibility of such a result.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say here that I have petitions signed by over 6,000 tobacco growers in my district, all of which were secured in less than ten days. I also have before the Committee on Ways and Means and in my office at the present time the protest of all the cigar makers, and those employed in the cigar factories, in my district, numbering between 10,000 and 15,000 people. Thus, still more do I feel that I would fail in my responsibility to my constituents were I not to oppose this measure in every way possible.

Mr. Chairman, the people of my district have always looked upon the member of the Ways and Means Committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as a man whose opinion they have taken in important matters, and one whom they would follow. I want to repeat to you again an extract from a speech of this gentleman, made in 1900, which was quoted here this morning:

The question of free trade or protection with respect to this little island (Porto Rico) is one of absolutely no importance; but when you come to say that under the limitations of the Constitution you must give free trade to the Philippines, you must incorporate into the body politic 12,000,000 Malays as citizens of the United States, and must extend to that archipelago our navigation laws, I call a halt. In behalf of my own people I am not willing to see the wage-earner of the United States, the farmer of the United States, put upon a level and brought into competition with the cheap half-slave labor, savage labor, of the Philippine Archipelago. [Loud applause.]

It may be interesting to speak for a few minutes of the planting, cultivating, harvesting, shedding, stripping, and packing of tobacco in our State; giving employment, as it does, almost all the year, and especially during the winter months. In addition to the people whom I have mentioned above, there are employed in the various warehouses in my district thousands of men who are kept busy in the final sorting of tobacco and packing it for shipment.

From March in one year, when our farmers plant their seed in some sheltered spot, until March of the following year, when they deliver the cured crop to the warehouse, our farmers are constantly employed in the care and growing of this tobacco. First, the seed is sown and afterwards the plants are put in the ground. They are cared for as any farmer would care for his plants. The tobacco is cut and hung in the barns; it is taken down in the winter time, stripped and packed in bundles, and delivered to the tobacco dealers' warehouses, thus furnishing work to thousands and thousands of people in our towns and villages who have no other employment, giving to them a subsistence which they could not otherwise get. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] calls my attention to the fact that I have omitted also the gathering and destroying of the tobacco worm. That is also a very important part of the growing of tobacco. We must watch, as we grow our tobacco, that the worms are destroyed or they will destroy the tobacco. I am a tobacco farmer myself, and I know all about the sowing and growing and harvesting of tobacco. In addition to the people I have mentioned, there are employed in my district many hundreds of people who have the care of the handling of the tobacco after it is delivered and put into the warehouses.

The gentleman from Connecticut has told us there is no danger from the growing of tobacco in the Philippine Islands, as there is not sufficient arable land there to produce any large amount of tobacco. The reports on the Philippines, the accuracy of which as to their acreage, I think, is not questioned, state that the islands contain 73,345,415 acres. The estimate placed upon the arable land is 9½ per cent. We believe that a great deal more land than this can be farmed to great advantage, yet, taking the percentage at 9½, we find there are 6,967,781 acres which is good farming land.

If we take but 10 per cent of this land for tobacco raising, we find that we have 696,781 acres of tobacco land. Figure 1,500 pounds to the acre, which is about one-half the amount which will be produced in these islands under good conditions, and we find that they can raise 1,045,000,000 pounds.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman is a tobacco grower himself. What is the yield of the product per acre?

Mr. CASSEL. About 1,600 to 2,000 pounds per acre.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why does the gentleman say that they produce more in the Philippines per acre than in Pennsylvania, when the record shows the production in the Philippine Islands is from 500 to 900 pounds per acre? And why does he not figure the product in Pennsylvania by the number of acres in it multiplied by 1,700?

Mr. CASSEL. Just wait until I get a little farther down in my figures and I will tell the gentleman about that. We do not produce, we do not farm that proportion.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why not? The gentleman is figuring that in the Philippines, and why not figure it in Pennsylvania?

Mr. CASSEL. If we were to farm that proportion in Pennsylvania we would.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman know of an ounce of tobacco raised within 10 miles of salt water in Pennsylvania?

Mr. CASSEL. No. We have no salt water in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. They will raise more tobacco in the Philippines on 1 acre than you can in Pennsylvania on 2.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not care to take the gentleman's time, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely mistaken, and the record shows it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one question. How do you figure the correct acreage of the Philippines as you have just given it? By including all the islands of the archipelago in that statement?

Mr. CASSEL. I am giving the figures reported by Secretary Taft.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That includes all the islands of the archipelago, of course.

Mr. CASSEL. Oh, no; just the land.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, the land; I did not mean the water.

Mr. CASSEL. I am figuring on taking the whole area.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Before answering the next question, I will remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania of this fact and then he can answer the question. By uncontradicted testimony we find that they do not raise in the Philippine Archipelago good merchantable commercial tobacco within 10 miles of the sea anywhere on the islands. Now, you draw that line 10 miles from the sea and it excludes every island for tobacco raising except only two.

Mr. CASSEL. Well, my dear sir——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That knocks out the great bulk of that acreage, provided your incorrect and false premise was true.

Mr. CASSEL. I am only taking 1 per cent of the land of the entire archipelago. Further than that, the statement laid down here by members of the committee and gentlemen who have returned from these islands when they say they can not raise tobacco within 20 miles of the seacoast is certainly a misstatement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The statement is not that you can not raise tobacco, but no tobacco that is salable in the United States. We saw it—rank, bad-smelling, tough tobacco.

Mr. CASSEL. Where do they raise tobacco in Porto Rico?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Near the center of the island. The best tobacco is raised in a certain section about Cayey. It is about 80 miles from San Juan to Ponce, and Cayey is about half way.

Mr. CASSEL. The island is about 40 miles wide. It is about 48 miles by air line from San Juan to Ponce. Cayey is exactly 10 miles from the sea at the farthest point. With reference to the contention of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that tobacco can be grown in only a limited area in the Philippines, "owing to the fact that it is a matter of world-wide knowledge that cigar tobacco can not be grown within 20 miles of the seacoast," I offer the statement of Professor Lyon, of the Bureau of Agriculture, made during the public hearings in the Philippine Islands before the Secretary of War and the Congressional party accompanying him. This statement is as follows:

The statement was made in the memorandum just read, and also it is one that is generally stated, that tobacco of good commercial quality is not produced within 12 to 20 miles of the littoral of any country. That is a very general statement that I am inclined to doubt, however, as applying to the whole world. If it were true in all cases, I am afraid that it would rule out the tobacco land of Porto Rico, as the tobacco raised there is raised under just such conditions. I am very sure that it would cut out a great deal of the famous Vuelta Abajo district of Cuba, which lies to the east of the city of Habana. I am sure that a great deal of that district lies between 10 and 20 miles of the seaboard. Also, in Mexico there is tobacco grown within that distance of the coast.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They do raise in Cuba good tobacco in less than 10 miles from the sea, but the fact they can not raise it in the Philippine Archipelago is a fact just as the other fact they can not raise the so-called "hemp plant" except in the Philippine Islands. Yet in other islands they have just the same soil and the same temperature and the same climate.

Mr. MAHON. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has the floor, yield to his colleague?

Mr. CASSEL. Let me finish just a few of my figures. Comparing the 1,045,000,000 pounds produced under favorable conditions on 1 per cent of the total land of the Philippine Islands with the total amount of tobacco grown in the United States, and we find at the present time there is devoted to tobacco culture 776,000 acres, producing annually about 800,000,000 pounds of tobacco.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is in the United States.

Mr. CASSEL. Yes, sir. Or, if we follow the argument furnished by the gentleman from Connecticut and limit the cigar-tobacco product to the provinces of Cagayan and Isabela, which he acknowledges produce a fair quality of cigar leaf, we find those two provinces have a combined area of six and one-half million acres; and while we may believe this land is nearly all adapted to the raising of tobacco, if we take but 2 per cent of this specially adapted land we find that there will be 130,000 acres available for the production of cigar leaf. The entire acreage in the United States devoted to the production of cigar leaf is 125,000 acres, producing 140,000,000 pounds. This would leave all the lands of the Philippine Islands, except 2 per cent of the area of the provinces of Cagayan and Isabela, for the production of hemp, sugar, etc., and may make more reasonable the fear of the tobacco men that the Philippine tobacco, grown with cheap labor, without fertilizer, and the advantages of a tropical climate, will seriously affect the growing of cigar leaf in the United States, and may possibly displace it altogether.

So the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs [Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin] that you can not grow good tobacco within 20 or even a dozen miles of the seacoast in the Philippines is not sustained by the report of the Department of Agriculture.

I want to say that in all of the arguments before the Ways and Means Committee and in all the arguments made before this House there has been a misunderstanding or misstatement in reference to the value of domestic and Philippine tobacco. They take the value of the Philippine tobacco ready for the manufacturer, and they take the value of the tobacco in the United States in the field. Tobacco in my district this year is selling at from 10 to 12 cents a pound in the field, and that same tobacco is worth from 20 to 35 cents after it is packed, sweated, and ready to deliver to the manufacturers.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. What do you mean by the statement "in the field?"

Mr. CASSEL. I mean that this tobacco of ours was sold before it was harvested, with the understanding that it was to be put into the sheds, dried, sweated, stripped, and delivered to the warehouse.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. And then weighed?

Mr. CASSEL. Then weighed.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. I wish to say that the Ways and Means Committee of this House do not know anything about the tobacco interest—not a thing. [Laughter.] They would not know if they would chew it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASSEL. Now, there was an earnest attempt made to find out the values and the proportions of the tobacco grown in the Philippine Islands, and Colonel Edwards appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means January 27, 1905, and made the statement that—the tobacco interests that have been represented here came to the conclusion that the price of tobacco in Manila was 5 cents a pound, practically from these figures. Quoting from the official returns of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the quantity and value of Philippine exports of leaf tobacco from 1899 to 1904 and dividing the number of pounds into the value they got 5 cents as the value. To disprove this claim, presumably, the War Department sent the following cable to its officials in Manila.

Now, there was a report of the Department of Insular Affairs which said that the average price of the tobacco raised in the Philippine Islands, delivered to the cigar manufacturers, was 5 cents a pound. An effort has been made to secure through the Bureau of Insular Affairs a positive value for the tobacco grown in the Philippine Islands.

I hold in my hand copies of a number of cablegrams sent in January, 1905, by Colonel Edwards, together with replies to the same, which I will read:

Opposition to 75 per cent reduction Philippine tobacco claim if total Philippine tobacco exports diverted to the United States will injure seriously 120,000,000 pounds annual United States domestic production cigar leaf. Cable immediately what proportion total Philippine exports unmanufactured tobacco is suitable for wrapper, proportion suitable for filler, suitable for other purposes, and average valuation each class per pound at Manila.

To which came the following reply:

With reference to your telegram of 18th, Shuster reports total exports tobacco fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, 19,044,290 pounds. Tavera gives exporters' figures 18,226,000 pounds. Twenty per cent of exports for wrappers at 30 cents gold per pound; remaining 80 per cent used for fillings and smoking tobacco. Price, fillings, 10 cents per pound; smoking tobacco, 7½ cents.

This did not appear to be satisfactory, so the War Department telegraphed again, as follows:

Customs figures fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, show amount exportations from the Philippine Islands unmanufactured tobacco, nineteen million odd pounds, at a value of million odd dollars. Opponents of our bill claim that this shows value in Manila, cigar leaf, 5 cents per pound. How do you reconcile these figures with price stated in your telegram of January 20? Consult Shuster; answer as soon as possible.

Which brought this reply:

With reference to your telegram of 22d, upon investigation Shuster finds his statistics as to amount of tobacco exported during the last fiscal year correct—as to value, incorrect—but based on sworn invoices by exporters, who, for some reason not very clear, have systematically and, as they claim, since 1883 undervalued tobacco exports. Figures given from investigation made by Tavera correct. In other words, value of tobacco exported last year was about $2,500,000, instead of $1,000,000 reported by Shuster. Made no actual investigation, for the reason that duties specified and no fraud on revenue committed.

He says the value is incorrect, but it is based on sworn statements by the exporters. There is no occasion for these people to make any unfair or any unjust reports when they come to export tobaccos, because there is no fraud committed upon it. This was supplemented by another cablegram from Manila, as follows:

Conference with tobacco exporters this morning develops following unanimous opinion: If Dingley tariff removed, no wrapper tobacco, as it is known in the United States, will go to the United States; only cigars and small amount selected filler. Think value exported tobacco stated yesterday at 2,500,000, based on Tavera's figures, is too high; less than 2,000,000 nearer correct. Figures given result conference with exporters' and Shuster's personal investigation. Difficult to get real values.

Now, here we have three different valuations placed upon the same year's exports by the Government experts in Manila. Is there any use trying to depend on any of the reports? Then comes another telegram.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would suggest to the gentleman that if he would ask the amount collected for tax he would find exactly the amount. Last year, in 1905, it was $16,276,266, about $8,000,000 less than was raised in one single county in Pennsylvania.

Mr. CASSEL. Let me read this other telegram:

[Answer received January 27.]

With reference to your telegrams of 26th, further investigation by Shuster develops estimate of 20 per cent of exports of tobacco being suitable for wrappers is misleading. The facts are there is only a small part of 1 per cent of this tobacco which would be used for wrappers by the manufacturers in the United States. It is very low grade tobacco used for cheap cigars made in Spain and other tobacco-monopoly countries. There is not more than enough wrapper tobacco produced here to meet demands local manufacturers' high-grade cigars. The most of these cigars are used here; a small proportion exported.

Impossible to get any accurate idea of the comparative amount of filler and smoking tobacco exported last year. It is nearly all very low grade, and little of it could be used in the United States for fillers.

Now, they first telegraphed that there was 20 per cent, and then a few days thereafter said there was only 1 per cent of exports of wrapper tobacco. I submit that this big drop in their estimate demonstrates the utter unreliability of the War Department's reports as to the valuation of the tobacco grown in the Philippines and exported.

I have examined the samples brought from the Philippines by the gentleman from Connecticut, and before referring to them further I desire to refer to the speech of the gentleman from New York, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in which he criticised the statement made by Mr. Bijur, president of the National Cigar Leaf Tobacco Association, when he said before the committee that the prices of our tobaccos, when compared with the shipping prices of Philippine tobacco, should be: New England, 35; New York, 18; Pennsylvania, 21, etc. In order to have a positive understanding regarding Mr. Bijur's position, I wrote him immediately in reference to same, and I will read his reply:

THE NATIONAL CIGAR LEAF TOBACCO ASSOCIATION,
New York, January 6, 1906.

Hon. H. B. CASSEL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of yesterday calling to my attention that part of Mr. PAYNE'S speech on the Philippine bill in which he quotes me as giving certain values to tobacco and using the words "that these should be the prices," in the sense of "that these ought to be the prices," I beg to say that it was not my intention that there should be any double meaning conveyed by the words I used. If you will look up the record of the hearing given the tobacco interests you will see that I complained of the use of tables furnished by Colonel Edwards of the prices of our domestic cigar tobaccos, because his table of prices furnished the farm values of our domestic tobaccos, and these values had evidently been used by the advocates of a reduction of duty on Philippine tobacco as a basis of comparison with a table of market values of Philippine tobacco, also furnished by Colonel Edwards. I distinctly told the Committee on Ways and Means that if the table of market values on the Philippine tobacco be used, they should substitute for Colonel Edwards's table of farm values the table of market values which I presented. In other words, instead of the prices—

New England	21.6
New York	10
Pennsylvania	8.9
Ohio	7.5
Wisconsin	7.8
Georgia and Florida	28.8

they must use:

New England	35
Pennsylvania	21
Georgia and Florida	80

The prices that I give in these tables are the market prices to-day, have been the prices for months past, and will be the prices for a long time to come if the domestic tobacco business is not upset by tariff tinkering in Washington. The affected misunderstanding by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of so elementary a distinction as the difference between values of tobacco at the farm and values of tobacco in condition for market is of a piece with the extraordinary and suspicious density that has confused all the testimony brought up by the domestic interests in connection with this Philippine reduction measure. The committee and the War Department as well has greedily swallowed all the testimony, no matter how contradictory and ridiculous, that has been offered by Manila manufacturers and their advocates and has refused credence in the slightest degree to the representations of American manufacturers, growers, and packers.

It is more remarkable that this attitude should obtain because in cables received by the War Department from the governor-general of the Philippines it is openly stated that for twenty years back Philippine exporters have persistently given false values on their exports of tobacco, apparently for the mere pleasure of deceiving the government, as no satisfactory explanation of this remarkable state of affairs has ever been given. Assertions, for example, that Sumatra wrapper, notoriously the toughest and strongest wrapper leaf produced in the world, was too tender to be worked by the hands of the expert Philippine cigar maker have been accepted as gospel.

In the face of the fact that Sumatra wrappers come into the United States—which takes the finest and fanciest grades alone of this tobacco, and gets it at an average price of 90 cents—in the face of this, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means indorses the statement of the Philippine manufacturers that the Sumatra they use costs them, inclusive of the duty of 23 cents a pound, $1.50 a pound. There is not a tobacco merchant familiar with Sumatra wrappers who would not cheerfully undertake, if the 23-cent duty remains in force, to supply the Manila manufacturer with a Sumatra wrapper for the next five years at a cost of 85 cents per pound, duty paid, and I for one would gladly pay a premium to get such a contract if it can be secured. As it takes about 2 pounds of Sumatra to wrap a thousand cigars, this would bring the cost to the Manila manufacturer who uses Sumatra to $1.70 a thousand, as against a cost of using Connecticut Habana seed, under absolute free trade, at $2 a thousand, using 4 pounds to the thousand, plus double the freight cost, and of using broad-leaf Connecticut to $5 a thousand, plus four times the freight cost.

The folly of suggesting that Connecticut wrappers, or American wrappers of any kind, will be used by manufacturers to whom other wrappers are available is apparent when I tell you that neither I nor any other packer of American tobacco has ever sold a box of high-grade American wrappers to any foreign country whatever.

I am glad to see, however, in the concluding paragraph of Mr. PAYNE'S remarks on tobacco that he has recognized the force of our objections to having one rate on Sumatra tobacco coming into this country and a much lower one on Sumatra tobacco going into the Philippines, although at the hearings granted by the Ways and Means Committee he ridiculed our claims as to the possibility of fraud in the customs under these conditions. If a change to the Dingley rates on Sumatra tobacco going into the Philippines is made, while it will in no way alter the force of the arguments presented by us against the desirability of our competition with the cooly (I do not refer exclusively to Chinese) labor of the East, it will at least permit our importers to maintain their standard of honesty and honor and not compel them in order to survive to devise means for defrauding the Government.

Yours, respectfully, A. BIJUR, President.

Thus you will see that the values of the Pennsylvania tobacco in the market, ready for the cigar manufacturer, is at the present time 21 cents.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I want to ask the gentleman another question. I do not wish him to answer unless he feels inclined to do so, and I do not wish him to put the question and the answer in the RECORD unless he chooses, if he will tell the House what he sold his crop for this year.

Mr. CASSEL. Yes, sir; I am very glad to say that I got for my crop this year on one field, 11 cents; on another field, 12 cents, right through, for the tobacco as it stood in the field, to be delivered after it was cured. But that is the price for that tobacco as it comes out of the shed; it is not the price that it sells for to the manufacturer. It goes into the hands of the dealer, and the dealer puts it through a sweat, and he must be at the expense of handling it and at the expense of insurance and interest. This all adds largely to the cost of the tobacco to the dealer, and he sells it to the manufacturer at an average of 21 cents a pound, against the price for the tobaccos shown us by the gentleman from Connecticut, which were delivered to the cigar manufacturers in the Philippines—some for 5 cents, some for 6 cents, some for 7 cents, and some for 10 cents per pound. According to the report of the War Department, there is not over 1 per cent of wrapper tobacco grown in the islands and it sells for 30 cents in gold per pound. While we do not believe this is correct, yet taking it with the other qualities of tobacco it will average the price of tobacco delivered to the manufacturer of cigars, at about 8 cents per pound. Add to this the duty of 8¾ cents, which is proposed by this bill for the next three years, and you make the price delivered in the United States 16¾, and this tobacco it is proposed to bring here and sell against our own product at 21 cents. Thus you see this tobacco will come into direct competition with ours, and will force our people to a reduction in price of from 2 to 3 cents per pound, costing the farmers of my district alone a loss of from $500,000 to $1,000,000 per annum.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has claimed that our cigar workers run graver danger of competition from the use of the Williams machine by the large manufactories than they do from the cheap labor of the Philippines. The Williams machine has been in use in this country about twenty years. It is a tool rather than a machine, and its chief advantage to the cigar manufacturer has been the readiness with which entirely green hands could learn to make cigars by its use. It has enabled the large manufacturer to go to small towns where there is a great number of unemployed girls and teach them, after a period of tutelage varying from six weeks to three months, to become efficient and satisfactory cigar makers of the lower grade of cigars. We have the testimony of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that machinery is not used at present in the Philippines. When we learn that this Williams machine, or rather tool, not only enables a green hand to become an efficient cigar maker in this short period of time, but also enables this hand, when expert, to turn out double the cigars that can be produced by hand work, it can readily be seen what an impetus the mere introduction of this tool into the Philippines will give their industry of producing low-grade cigars. It will reduce their already low wages per thousand while increasing the earning capacity of the operators; moreover and most important, figuring that it will take the native Filipino six months to learn what the American country girl can readily absorb in six weeks, it will enable Manila manufacturers to increase their cigar-making force any desired amount in six months' time from any given period.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] stated that the Connecticut growers who came before the Ways and Means Committee were converted from their hostility to the Philippine bill at an interview which I understand they had at the residence of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] on the evening of the day of the tobacco hearing. If this refers to Messrs. J. H. Pierce, of Enfield, and Col. E. N. Phelps, of Windsor, the only Connecticut growers who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, I can say that this statement is wholly erroneous. I am at liberty to quote the following extract from a letter from Mr. Pierce, dated December 26, in which Colonel Phelps concurs:

> You have probably heard from Colonel Phelps before this time, so that I will only say that Mr. HILL tried to make us think that we were in no danger whatever from Philippine competition, but he was unable to convince us. He promised to try to get the 25 per cent duty on. That was the most we could do.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman will pardon me. I understand the gentleman to say that the price he got for his tobacco was 11 cents for one field as taken from the barn and sent to the manufacturers.

Mr. CASSEL. No, no; not to the manufacturers. Sent to the dealer.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, yes. Will the gentleman kindly look at the prices, taking the average for five years, and there can not have been any change for five years, the tobacco taken from the box at the factory in Manila precisely in the same way as from the bale from the farm, the first quality sold for 18 cents, and the second 15, and the third quality 12, the fourth 9, and the fifth 6¼, and see whether it does not average in Manila away beyond what he sold his for in Pennsylvania this year?

Mr. CASSEL. I think they are getting more for their tobacco than we do get here, but my figure is this——

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. If these people can not compete with us, why should we drive them out of the industry?

Mr. CASSEL. I will go further into that and answer in a short time from the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] himself, in which he shows by his own figures that the people in the Philippine Islands are getting more money to-day for their labor than the people of the United States are getting for doing the same kind of labor. Now, why are we trying to break down this interest of our farmers by creating a disturbance and unsettling conditions in this country when we are not going to give these people any benefit whatever by so doing? If you will take the average prices as given to us by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], that tobacco does not average the grower in the Philippine Islands over 5 cents at his farm.

I will incorporate in my remarks at this point the following letter and table from the speech of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 21, 1905.

SIR: Referring to conversation with reference to wages paid workmen in cigar factories in the Philippine Islands, I have the honor to inform you that the census of the Philippine Islands shows that prior to 1898 and in 1902 the following wages (local currency) were paid, and while I regret to state that we haven't an official statement of the rate of wages paid now, it is very generally known that the wages of employees in the Philippine Islands have, up to the present time, increased steadily since American occupation, and that at present the wages received are considerably greater than those indicated in the census report for 1902:

	Average wages paid prior to 1898 (pesos).[a]		Average wages paid in 1902 (pesos).[a]
	Per day.	Per month.	Per day.	Per month.
Cigar box factory foreman	0.75	.....	2.00	.....
Cigar box fillers	.80	.....	2.00	.....
Cigar box makers	.50	.....	1.50	.....
Cigar factory foremen	.....	35.00	.....	80.00
Cigar sorters	.80	.....	2.00	.....
Cigarette packers	.50	.....	1.00	.....
Cigarette makers	.40	.....	1.37	.....
Cigar makers	.80	.....	2.00	.....

[a] Take one-half of these rates for value in American gold.

Very respectfully,

FRANK MCINTYRE.

Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL,
House of Representatives.

The familiar cry of ruin, starvation, and imminent disaster of various kinds is brought in all the cables sent here from the Manila operatives. In this connection the figures of the gentleman from Connecticut are very interesting. It has been claimed right along that the cost of living in the Philippines has advanced 100 per cent since American occupation. It is gratifying to note from the gentleman's table showing the wages of cigar makers since 1898 that these have increased in much greater proportion than the advanced cost of living. He tells us that the average wage rate of the cigar maker in 1898 was less than a dollar per day, in 1902 it had advanced to $1, and that it is to-day still higher, reaching as high as $2. If this is correct there is no industry in the United States that has made such an advance in prosperity in this or any other line. It seems as though the cry of hard times for the Philippine cigar maker is rather unjustified. With these circumstances in mind, it must be that the advocates of reduction of duties on Philippine tobacco have in mind added prosperity for the capitalists who own the factories. The prosperity of the workman would appear to be already looked out for.

If they get as much as our farmers, why should they ask for more?

Mr. MAHON. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Has a case of tobacco from any part of the United States ever been shipped to Manila?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; I will answer that question. I was going to answer it a little further along, but if my friend wishes to hear about it I will answer him now. The gentleman from Connecticut in his speech, on Saturday last, stated that he had seen 5 boxes of Connecticut wrappers in a cigar factory in the Philippines, and that he had seen some of the cigars made from the same. He said:

I found one factory where they had been experimenting with five cases of Connecticut wrappers. The first case was bought at 50 cents a pound, and so much satisfaction had from it that a second purchase of four cases was made at 55 cents a pound. In addition to this, a duty of 23 cents and expenses of shipment halfway around the world brought this domestic wrapper of ours to their hands at a practical cost of 80 cents a pound.

I told him at the time he made his speech that I could find no record in the Monthly Summary of Commerce up to the ending of July, 1905, of any tobacco imported into the Philippine Islands from the United States.

I want now to correct my statement and to say that the Bureau reports no tobacco to have been received in the Philippine Islands during the year 1905, and no tobacco to have been received during 1904, and no tobacco to have been received after the 31st day of July, 1903, but prior to that date there were received five cases, containing 1,434 pounds of tobacco, costing $768. This would be, according to the figures submitted by the gentleman from Connecticut, one case at 50 cents and four cases at 55 cents per pound.

But this tobacco was shipped to the islands prior to 1903. It has been there ever since. It certainly could not have proved a profitable investment or the tobacco would have been used up long before this time. I have no doubt that that is the tobacco which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] found in Manila, still standing there in the factory after three years. If that is so, then if those people could use this tobacco in competition with the tobacco of Sumatra and that which they themselves grew, why did they keep it in their factory for three years without making use of it?

It shows, I think, the utter fallacy of the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut that any of their tobacco will ever be used in the Philippine Islands for wrappers so long as the manufacturers over there can secure Sumatra at a reasonable price.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I have a statement from the War Department that there was shipped to the Philippine Islands last year 20,665 pounds of unmanufactured tobacco.

Mr. CASSEL. They do not show that in their report of the Philippines Islands. Here is your own table, furnished you by the Insular Bureau of the War Department, showing the entire tobacco traffic between the Philippine Islands and all nations, which is as follows:

Year.	Pounds.	Value.
1899	None.	.....
1901	4,655	$435
1905	None.	.....

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is easily accounted for by the fact that the calendar year does not coincide with the fiscal year. One ends on the 30th of June and the other ends on the 31st of December.

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; I know that; but your own figures are for fiscal and not calendar years. And no figures are compiled, I understand, for a portion of a year.

Mr. MAHON. That was tobacco that was shipped for the War Department. If you want to get statistics, you go to the Treasury Department. The War Department knows nothing about commercial affairs.

Mr. CASSEL. Now, there is a difference of opinion, of course, between the two Departments of the Government as to whether they received any, or whether they did not. I have only the record filed by the gentleman from Connecticut himself.

Now, if you will bear with me for a few moments longer, I want to refer in detail to a few of the arguments made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. He says that there are to-day in the Philippine Islands seven and a half million people and that in fifty years from now they will have a population of 25,000,000, if a stable government is maintained. The people of the Philippine Islands grow about 50,000,000 pounds of tobacco. They export about 20,000,000 pounds, 17,000,000 pounds of which go to Spain. They can grow, as I showed you, an unlimited amount of tobacco if they have the labor. The records show that they can grow the finest kind of tobacco if given the proper care. Under Spanish rule when, we were told by the gentleman from Connecticut, they were compelled by the government to raise a certain quantity of tobacco as well as a certain quality, as far as they could, they raised the finest kind of tobacco that was grown.

I desire here to quote the interesting statement of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] regarding the cultivation of tobacco in the Philippines:

The growing of tobacco was introduced into the Philippine Islands in the sixteenth century by the Spaniards. Its cultivation and sale was held as an absolute monopoly by the Spanish Government for one hundred years.

With reference to the success of the industry and the quality of the product I shall not express my individual opinion, but shall quote from well-recognized authorities on the subject.

First, from the commissioner of internal revenue of the islands, from the advance sheets of his report for the fiscal year of 1905, not yet printed, and to which I have fortunately had access within the last few days. He says:

In the provinces of Cagayan and Isabela is produced the only tobacco fit for use in the manufacture of the better quality of cigars and cigarettes. Except for limited local consumption by the persons raising it or for purposes of blending it with the better leaf, there is no demand for the tobacco raised outside of the provinces of Cagayan and Isabela. The Spanish Government had a monopoly which lasted one hundred years in the manufacture of all leaf tobacco produced in these islands. The Government supervision over the planting, curing, and sorting of the leaf was absolute, and the quality of the tobacco was improved and the quantity increased by such supervision. In 1882 the Government monopoly was abolished and the planting and manufacture of tobacco become free for all. Since then the quality of the leaf produced in Cagayan and Isabela has constantly deteriorated from season to season. No sufficient preparation of the soil, no care in the selection of the seed, of the method of planting, or of the growing of the leaf, crude methods in curing the leaf, and dishonest practices of middlemen in sorting it for sale have all contributed to discredit the former fair fame of Philippine tobacco both abroad and at home. A constantly increasing number of smokers in these islands are discarding the domestic cigar and cigarette and are smoking cigars imported from Sumatra and elsewhere, imported Chinese smoking tobacco, and even cigarette and pipe tobacco from the United States. On May 18, 1905, some of the leading cigar and cigarette manufacturers of Manila entered into an agreement having for its object an increase in the production and improvement in the quality of the tobacco leaf in Cagayan and Isabela, as well as to secure, if possible, more uniformity in the sorting of the leaf by middlemen. Little effective work, however, has as yet been done along these lines. Meanwhile the quality of the leaf continues to deteriorate, and the local manufacturers find it an increasingly difficult task to supply demands for domestic consumption.

It is beyond dispute that the abolition of this government supervision and the leaving of the natives to their own devices and methods and crude cultivation has been exceedingly disastrous to the quantity and quality of the tobacco product of the archipelago. So that the general conclusion, quoted by Internal-Revenue Agent Brown on page 191 of the report referred to, may be accepted as accurate at the present time. He says:

"Manufacturers of cigars in these islands, dealers in native leaf tobacco, consumers in the islands of Manila cigars, manufacturers and merchants abroad who have handled in past years Philippine tobacco, consumers abroad of Manila cigars, and the Filipino, whether grower or tobacco merchant, are all of one mind on the tobacco question. Philippine tobacco has gradually sunk to a deplorable level."

We see from this that the tobacco grown upon the islands is inferior to what they formerly raised because of the indifference of the farmer. Let American capital and push once get established on the island and you will find not only an increase in the quantity, but also in the quality. Secretary Taft recommends leasing of the government lands to individuals or corporations of 5,000 acres for tobacco culture and 20,000 acres for sugar culture. He must expect people with capital to go there or he would not make recommendations of this kind.

Testimony has been given before the Ways and Means Committee showing that 3,000 acres of land in Florida and Georgia covered with shade had produced last year 12,000 bales of wrapper tobacco, equal in wrapping capacity to one-third of our importations of Sumatra, and the experts have told the Committee on Ways and Means that it will require only 9,000 acres, covered with shade, in the Philippines to produce as many bales of wrappers as our entire importation of Sumatra wrapper. Thirty thousand acres of shade-grown Philippine wrappers, an undertaking easily within the means of any of the big Dutch companies now settled in Sumatra, will produce enough wrappers to supply the entire cigar production of the United States, eliminating every leaf of Connecticut and Florida wrapper grown and every bale of Sumatra imported.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I presume the gentleman is not familiar with the fact, but I made inquiry in regard to shade-grown tobacco in the Philippine Islands and was informed that the experiment had been made, and that it was a total failure and had practically been given up.

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; and so the Department of Agriculture will tell you that the experiment in Lancaster, Pa., was a failure; and so they told me a few years ago that it was a failure in Connecticut, when the first experiment was made; that it was not a success, and it is because it takes an intelligent grower, an intelligent man, to be in charge of tobacco raised in that way. Now, there is no question but that the climatic conditions in the Philippine Islands will produce the finest tobacco grown under the sun if properly cared for and cultivated.

Now, the gentleman from Connecticut told us in reference to the people over there that if you paid a man 25 cents a day he would work enough days in a week to support him through the week; that if you doubled that amount, he would work one-half the time, and if you increase it to a dollar or $2, he would cut down the amount of his labor in proportion; that all his ambition was to maintain existence.

Now, these are the people that you want to bring in contact and in competition with the sober, honest, industrious, hard-working, saving people of this country, and put them on a par with our people without giving any recompense in the matter.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. CASSEL. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I know the gentleman is thoroughly familiar with and understands the growing and cultivation of tobacco. Why do we not get tobacco from the Sandwich Islands? They have the climate and soil; why do not we get a pound of tobacco from those islands?

Mr. CASSEL. There are many places under the sun where they could produce different kinds of agricultural products which they do not grow because they are not accustomed to grow them.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Is the gentleman aware that in the Sandwich Islands they made a determined effort to grow tobacco, and they grew a plant 6 to 10 feet high, a magnificent product, but when they came to cure it they couldn't cure a pound of it? It was as black as your hat; they couldn't cure a pound of it. It was absolutely worthless for tobacco.

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; that is owing to the peculiar conditions there.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Precisely the same condition exists in most of the Philippine Islands. There is no tobacco produced in the Sandwich Islands, although the soil, labor, and climate are as good as could be desired in the world.

Mr. CASSEL. But I am taking the gentleman's own figures. I am eliminating from my reckoning all of the Philippine Islands except Cagayan and Isabela, and I am taking but 2 per cent of that territory, and certainly the amount of land we are using in the proposition is so small it is hardly worth while considering further. Now, Mr. Chairman, I purpose at the proper time——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment again?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why do we not raise good tobacco in southern California and make it a great product of southern California? Simply because of the climatic conditions, which make it impossible.

Mr. CASSEL. But you say these two provinces would and could produce good tobacco—Cagayan and Isabela—and I am figuring now, and my whole contention in reference to the tobacco grown in the Philippine Islands is that those two provinces, taking only 2 per cent of their land, will produce more leaf tobacco than the United States at the present time.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will say to the gentleman that estimates are good at times, but when he has statistics—he can get from the Agricultural Department exactly how many acres were planted with tobacco last year and the year before and the year before, and so it is not necessary to figure in millions when he has the actual figures in thousands before him if he chooses to take them.

Mr. CASSEL. And does the gentleman mean to say the idea of this bill is to restrict the tobacco from there to the amount produced at the present time?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Of course I do not. I say the restriction is made by the Almighty, and not by anybody else.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is there any difference in the conditions of the tobacco raised in your district and in the district represented by the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What are they?

Mr. CASSEL. The tobacco grown in my district is the filler tobacco. The tobacco grown in the district which Mr. HILL represents in Connecticut is wrapper tobacco. The filler tobacco sells in the market at the present time at about 31 cents. The wrapper tobacco which Mr. HILL represents sells in the market at the present time at from 50 to 70 cents a pound. Is that right?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. At about 50 cents. I think they told me a month ago up there about 40 cents. The gentleman from Hartford can give more definite figures in regard to that than I can.

Mr. CASSEL. But it is the filler-tobacco growers who will be specially affected by this competition.

In considering figures of domestic tobacco values it should be remembered that Pennsylvania and Ohio tobacco is considered as entirely filler tobacco, that Connecticut tobacco contains both wrapper and binder, and that Wisconsin and New York tobacco contains binder and filler, and Florida and Georgia, wrapper and filler tobaccos. As less than 1 per cent of Philippine tobacco is adjudged by the Department witnesses to be suitable for wrapper in this country, it is perfectly clear that the immediate brunt of the invasion of our market by Philippine tobacco must be borne by the filler-producing States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, Wisconsin, and Florida.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, let me ask the gentleman why does he not raise 40-cent tobacco in Lancaster instead of the 10 or 11 cent tobacco that he does? Why does he not raise the 40-cent tobacco?

Mr. CASSEL. I would say it has been my privilege to raise and sell tobacco at 25 cents a pound in the field, but it requires a great deal of care, a great deal of fertilizing; it has an effect upon the land for future uses, and on that account, and because of certain——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Climatic conditions?

Mr. CASSEL. Possibly climatic conditions. We have not been raising that quality of tobacco, and I want to say this: I believe our district and many other districts can grow good wrapper tobacco, but that the profits on it will not be as much in proportion as tobacco they are now growing, because we grow more pounds to the acre than you do. The filler tobacco weighs more than that fine wrapper tobacco, and the income from the growing of it on our land is nearly as great as you have from yours.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. If the gentleman will pardon me, I hold a supplement of the United States Crop Reporter, issued by the Agricultural Department here a few days ago, in which the yield per acre of Pennsylvania is given at 1,370 pounds and Connecticut at 1,725 pounds to the acre, so I would have to differ on the proposition that you grow more to the acre than we do.

Mr. CASSEL. I have no record here to show my contention in that respect.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I have.

Mr. CASSEL. But I do know we grow and get more money for the acre of good heavy filler than we do for an acre of fine wrapper, which does not bring us in the amount of money which your wrapper brings to you. With this explanation I am willing to insert here the gentleman's own tables for the information they contain:

I will insert in the RECORD here prices of the various samples of tobacco brought by me from Manila and now on exhibition in the lobby of the House. The large samples were furnished at my request by the Insular Company, and the prices are the average prices for the past five years, as taken from their books, and is the bale price.

The samples in envelopes are sorted leaves, furnished by the Yebana Company, in Manila.

I also put with these prices extract from the Supplement of the Crop Reporter of the United States, published by authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, at Washington, December, 1905, page 77, showing average production and value of the tobacco crop of the States and Territories for the year 1905.

Large tobacco samples, Isabela de Luzon, in hands as taken from bales:

1. 1ª de 1904. Isabela de Luzon: Eighteen cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
2. 2ª de 1903. Isabela de Luzon: Fifteen cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
3. 3ª de 1903. Isabela de Luzon: Twelve cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
4. 4ª de 1903. Isabela de Luzon: Nine cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
5. 5ª de 1900. Isabela de Luzon: Six and one-half cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.

Tobacco samples in envelopes, sorted and in separate leaves:

Now, there are a great many points which we might take up in this discussion. I believe, however, that I have proved to you, first, that the Philippine Islands will produce more tobacco than we grow at the present time in the United States; second, that they will produce a quality of tobacco which will come in direct competition with tobacco grown in the United States; third, that by leaving on 8¾ cents a pound you do not give us sufficient protection for the farmers of our country.

The Hon. Jacob Riis, an eminent sociological writer, recently stated that he had not forgotten the period (under Grover Cleveland's Administration) when women and children starved in cold garrets and when gaunt and hollow-eyed men vainly roamed the streets in search of work. "Lest we forget," every protectionist should ever keep this before him.

You have no right to put a free-trade clause into this bill at this time. And I therefore shall offer at the proper time these two amendments. First:

On page 2, lines 5 and 6, strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty."

When this amendment comes up I shall be prepared to explain to you in a few words the effect which this will have upon our cigar manufacturers.

I shall also offer the following amendment:

On page 3 strike out lines 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and line 13 to and including the word "duty," as follows:

"And provided further, That on and after the 11th day of April, 1909, all articles and merchandise going from the United States into the Philippine Islands, and all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, shall be admitted free of duty."

I want to say that we can not afford to allow that part of the bill to go through at this time. We are told it is left in there in order to raise revenue for these people for the next two or three years. No man living can tell the condition of the Philippine Islands in the year 1909. We do not know whether they will need this revenue or whether they will not need it. Consequently, let us wait until that time comes and then consider that proposition. If these amendments are admitted, I believe that this bill can pass this House, but should these amendments be voted down I shall offer the following:

On page 3, line 13, after the word "duty," insert the following: "And on said 11th day of April, 1909, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to leave the government and control of the Philippine Islands to their people."

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any idea that that amendment is germane to this bill?

Mr. CASSEL. I have seen amendments put into a bill that were not germane. I have seen all kinds of things done in this House, the wildest of which have been proposed and put through by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is not that resolution germane? The gentleman has said it is not. Let him tell wherein it is not.

Mr. CASSEL. I will let the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] answer that, if he can. If we are defeated on these amendments, I shall be glad to have the assistance of the Democratic party in passing that amendment to the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will advocate the germaneness of an amendment getting rid of the Philippines on any basis, even under the general-welfare clause.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. During ten years' service in the House of Representatives it has been my habit to support legislation whenever recommended by all of the majority members of the reporting committees. With this record in mind it is consoling to be assured that the pending bill did not have the unqualified approval of the Republican membership of the Ways and Means Committee. Nevertheless, I regret that the committee did not agree upon a measure that with a consistent regard for the interests of my constituents I could support.

The bill now being considered would be more satisfactory to many if amended to provide for a duty in the islands 35 cents on filler and $1.85 per pound on wrapper tobacco imported from elsewhere than the United States—in other words, placing the tobacco growing and cigar manufacturing industries of the islands on a common level, conferring the same privileges with like restrictions as in continental America.

In this connection I may say that such an amendment was suggested by my colleague, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and was understood to be acceptable to Secretary Taft.

It is claimed doubtless with candor by advocates of the proposed legislation that if enacted American wrapper tobacco will find a ready market in the Philippine Islands.

This is an attractive but delusive proposition, and does not appeal to tobacco growers in Connecticut, Pennsylvania, or Florida, the principal wrapper-producing States, where it is found difficult to compete with fine light-colored Sumatra-grown wrappers, although subject to a duty of nearly $2 a pound, and of which, despite a seemingly high duty, more than $5,000,000 worth is annually imported.

With this fact in view, American tobacco growers are naturally reluctant to believe that Philippine cigar manufacturers requiring light wrappers will purchase the American-grown article, when Sumatra, of superior quality in some respects, can be more easily obtained from a neighboring island by paying a duty of only 22½ cents per pound, each pound equal to wrapping nearly four times the number of cigars than the same weight of Connecticut wrappers will cover.

If the Philippines are to remain permanently under American jurisdiction, as most of the statesmen, members of the Ways and Means Committee, and other distinguished gentlemen who recently visited the islands believe, then the Philippines should be recognized as American territory, alike with Hawaii and Porto Rico, and as Congress may direct the Constitution and laws of the United States should follow the national flag, for under our form of government there can be no place for a colonial system without endangering the stability of the Republic. Wherever the American flag is raised as a token of sovereignty the Constitution and rights of citizenship inherent in that instrument should speedily follow.

If correct in the assumption that the Philippine Archipelago will continue to be an American possession, the Ways and Means Committee should withdraw the makeshift bill the House is asked to approve and report a comprehensive measure extending to the Philippines the customs duties and internal-revenue laws, the merchant-marine and coastwise-shipping laws now operative in our other insular possessions. Should it be claimed that our treaty obligations with Spain prevent such drastic legislation at this time, then I say that until these obligations lapse our first duty is to protect the rights of American citizens rather than to consider the interests of an alien race upon the other side of the globe. [Applause.]

When legislation upon the broad lines I have indicated is brought before Congress it will be a patriotic duty to support the measures proposed, but until this is done, as a representative of one of the largest tobacco-growing interests in the country, a constituency notably intelligent, prosperous, and fair minded, a people who usually reach correct conclusions and who generally believe that the enactment of legislation proposed in the bill before the House will be injurious to important industries, I must, when a roll call is had, cast my vote in accordance with a sense of duty as well as in deference to the views of constituents whose judgment I have learned to respect. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, at this late hour it would look like cruelty to animals to attempt to make a thirty-minute address. I have no desire to afflict my associates on the floor of this House with a speech of that length, but I shall, however, before I begin, ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, so that I may not occupy more than fifteen or twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the very able address of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE], who closed with this:

> The Committee on Ways and Means has heeded the prayer of the Filipino; will it not now give some attention to the petitions of our home folks?

I will go a little further, and say not only the home folks but the industries of this country.

In the debate which took place before the holiday recess on the reference of the President's message to the proper committees, the House was treated to a very interesting discussion on the deterioration of our legislative bodies, and especially the House of Representatives. Various general causes were assigned, such as the lack of exercise of the important functions of the taxing power and the fear of popular government on the part of so-called "better citizens," and such special causes as the gradual usurpation of power on the part of the Executive and the Senate.

I fear the gentlemen overlooked a much simpler and more fundamental explanation—the suggestion that perhaps our legislative bodies no longer represent the sentiments of the actual people. In looking over these assemblies we find many members who are political placemen and who are obedient to some leader or boss. From such assemblies the people no longer expect legislation intended for their benefit, as experience has proven that such favors are shown only to influential and wealthy private citizens or to special industries or interests or combines. As the people no longer expect much, if anything, from such bodies, they have grown indifferent to them, and by this means it has come to pass that the assemblies have lost or are losing their representative character.

The application of this thought to the House of Representatives is very strikingly illustrated by the bill now under discussion for regulating the tariff on imports from the Philippines. I desire to say at the outset that I have the most profound respect for this House, its traditions, and its members, and I feel second to none in the pride of membership. If, therefore, I am prompted to say even a single word of criticism on its character and tendencies, it is with the deepest regret that I should be justified by the spectacle of this House falling away from some of its lofty ideals.

We have been assured by the Administration that the Philippine Islands are already an inseparable possession of our country, which the Democratic party will not be permitted to give away or allowed to achieve its independent existence. We are told that for all purposes it is as much a part of the country as Porto Rico or Alaska. And the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee admit in their report on this bill that the islands should have free trade, as free as obtains between all the States in the Union.

Yet the very object of the bill is to continue a tariff on Philippine tobacco and sugar, not because they are in urgent need of the money to be raised thereby, which might have been some excuse, if true; but because the American tobacco and sugar industries must be pacified. Think of it. The products of our Philippine fellow-citizens are to be taxed, and incidentally we ourselves must pay the tax, because two private industries might make trouble. It is not the good of the American people or our Philippine wards which is being considered, but the good of certain private interests. Is this the way the House of Representatives justifies its title?

I have listened patiently to all the arguments advanced in favor of the retention of these duties, but they are all frankly addressed to the tobacco and sugar growers without a thought of what the people might say of them. For instance, in the majority report we are told that "with absolute free trade both ways, it would seem that American tobacco is more likely to go to the Philippine Islands than that their product should come here." There is a demand for Sumatra wrappers grown in Connecticut, and they will take the place of the real Sumatra as soon as the Philippine tariff is removed. The free traders should take heart when assured by protectionists that the abolition of tariffs both ways will stimulate American exports.

But the Philippine manufacturers can not produce a cigar that will have an extensive sale in this country because of the inferior quality of their tobacco and the effects of a long ocean voyage. In fact, on account of the way they are made, with the leaf wrapped lengthwise, these Philippine cigars could not be given away in this country; our people would not have them as Christmas gifts. However, the cigar-making industry is assured that this bill is no menace to it, because there will be no free trade, the bill providing for the retention of part of the existing tariff.

As to the effect on the cigar makers I quote from the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who made two trips to the Philippine Islands for the purpose of studying the existing conditions:

So far as Chinese labor is concerned, in the census of the year 1902 out of 1,714 cigarette makers all but 2 were Filipinos, there being of the Chinese 1 male and 1 female. Of the 11,036 cigar makers, there were of Chinese 29 males and 1 female; of whites, 38 males, and of negroes, 3 males. In other words, there were 8 more white cigar makers than there were Chinese, and only 71 of any other nationality than Filipino. But last February Mr. A. Determan, appointed by the cigar manufacturers and workmen of Manila to represent them before the Ways and Means Committee, made a statement in writing, found on page 231 of the hearings, in which he says, "There is not one Chinese cigar maker in Manila, to correct a false statement to the contrary." I am entirely satisfied from personal observation that the statement is correct. I stood at the gate of the Oriente factory one Saturday afternoon during the past summer and saw the employees, 1,400 in number, pass out at the close of the week's work, and a more clean, orderly, intelligent-looking body of employees it would be difficult to find anywhere outside of the United States. They were all Filipinos.

It is claimed by some that the lowering of the duty on cigars puts the American workman in competition with a cheap class of labor in the Orient, and efforts have been made before the committee and in other places to show that Chinese coolies are employed in this industry in Manila. A greater mistake could not have been made by the opponents of this bill. I have heard these statements and received these communications with great surprise, for in four of the largest factories in Manila which I visited this summer I did not see one Chinaman employed, and I respectfully refer all who entertain this fear to the census statistics of the islands. These persons do not seem to understand that Chinese exclusion and alien contract labor laws exist in the Philippines, and that upon the demand of the Filipinos as well as Americans they are more vigorously enforced there than they are here.

The main point in all this is that the American people are not told that the object of the tariff is to protect them from poor cigars or that it would menace their health if some 100,000,000 Philippine cigars were to be admitted free; there is no indication in the bill or the report that the hearts of the majority Members are throbbing with any such philanthropic purpose. No; only the tobacco industry, a private interest, is assured of the majority's extreme consideration; they are several times assured that the bill is no menace to them.

These American manufacturers are even assured that the Manila manufacturers are not at all enthusiastic over the passage of this bill, even with the prospect of cheaper American wrappers, because they believe that the result will be a growing demand for more wages. Here is a frank admission that the reduction and abolition of tariffs will result in raising wages. Can it be that the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee are surrendering their whole position, the platforms of their party for many years, and are making a bid for a standing in the Democratic ranks? What need of further argument when they admit that free trade produces higher wages?

Then, as to Philippine sugar, the report assures the growers that they have nothing to fear from this bill. We are told that Philippine sugar can not be laid down at New York, even free of duty, at much less than 4 cents a pound, while the growers admit that the cost of refined sugar at the Michigan factories is less than 4 cents a pound, and at the Colorado factories is little more than 3½ cents a pound. Since the freight charges to the markets will be practically the same from New York as from Michigan or Colorado, these growers are assured that even without a tariff conditions are just about equal and they have nothing to fear.

Again, the growers are told that the sugar industry of the Philippines is an infant one; that its growth is bound to be slow because the working animals are dying off, and the Filipinos are not as strong as our workers; besides, they will have to learn modern methods of growing sugar, and when they have learned they will demand higher wages; in the meanwhile, the American consumption of sugar is increasing by leaps and bounds, and it will not wait until the Filipinos have acquired enough skill to furnish the supply. All this to assure the growers that they have no fear of the Philippine sugar, even if admitted free.

But in order to satisfy them a duty of 25 per cent of the present Dingley rates has been retained, thus settling all doubts as to their protection against our Philippine fellow-citizens.

Do we hear any arguments addressed to the American public in all this? Are they told that through the kindness of Congress in lowering the tariff our Philippine brethren will be given a chance to sweeten the cheering cup at about the same cost as at present? Are we even told that after a careful investigation the Philippine sugar has been found not up to the standard, and we must be protected against the consumption of such a demoralizing article? No; nothing of the kind; only the sugar growers are considered, and they are assured that a tariff will be retained for their special protection until 1909.

What a spectacle is here presented! We have a bill providing for the admission of all Philippine products into the United States free of duty, with the exception of sugar and tobacco, on which the duty is to be lowered to one-third of the present rates. This is beautifully noble and patriotic, and speaks volumes for American brotherliness; unfortunately, the exceptions which are made spoil all the beauty of the act, for it is fair to presume that nothing else of much consequence is imported from the Philippines or some powerful interest would arise to demand its addition to the 25 per cent list.

It is generally conceded that if we are to keep these islands there must be freedom of trade; both national parties are united in that, and the report of the committee frankly admits it. A bill to establish free trade should pass unanimously and without discussion.

But the sugar and tobacco men immediately raise a tempest and claim that such a bill would seriously hurt them. The Philippine sugar, of which we now import less than 1 per cent of the American consumption (21,000 tons to 2,750,000 tons), might become a dangerous rival. Philippine sugars made in the Cuban fashion, of which their total output is about 1½ per cent of the American consumption, might actually be given away and not hurt their business.

These gentlemen are assured that they have nothing to fear, that Philippine competition will have no more effect on them than the competition of one State in the Union will have on another; but they will not be satisfied. Then an exception is made in their favor and a duty of 25 per cent is retained. This should serve not only as a salve to their wounded feelings, but as a bonus which they are permitted to collect from the American people for a few years more, by which time they will probably be so rich that they won't care whether there is free trade or not.

Thus we have the spectacle of the House of Representatives turning away from its admitted "plain duty" in order to placate some few people; of the House sacrificing the general interests of the people for the benefit of special industries, or, to put it in a much-hackneyed expression, of the House legislating for the classes as against the masses.

This bill, as I have already suggested, furnishes a striking example of the tendency of our legislative bodies to drift away from their representative ideal and to become the creatures of special interests or even individual bosses. I would respectfully request the distinguished philosophers of the House to take this into account when again searching for the causes of its decline in power and influence.

The same reactionary tendency is observable of the treatment of every phase of the tariff question by the party in power.

There is a growing demand in every section of the country and among all classes for some reduction or revision of the tariff. I need hardly speak of the attitude of the Democratic party, which misses no opportunity of showing the people how necessary is such action, but of course it is accused of being partisan and actuated by a desire for power. However false this accusation, it can not be urged against the press of the country, which is unanimous in advising revision in one way or another. And what shall be said of that wing of the Republican party advocating the Iowa idea, which has grown so large and powerful that it is no longer considered heretical and which was accorded a half-hearted recognition in the last Republican national platform? The Republican party of Massachusetts, in its State convention last year, made similar demands, and the gentleman from that Commonwealth [Mr. LAWRENCE] ably voiced its views on the floor of this House on Saturday last.

Yet, in spite of this grand chorus for revision inside and outside their party, the majority leaders of this House have announced that they will "stand pat." No measures looking to revision will be considered, because they fear a general discussion of the tariff. The voice of the people, the cry of the overprotected, the appeals from members of their own party, made with full knowledge that the fate of Ishmael awaits them, all are of no avail. A deaf ear is turned, and all attempts to broach the subject are sternly discouraged. It can not be that these worthy gentlemen are ignorant of the demand and the necessity for some revision, and we will not be uncharitable enough to believe that they mistake their own personal views for the opinions of the people.

The only explanation of their attitude is that trusts and powerful interests, which have grown and fattened on the tariff, if not actually created thereby, will not consent to having it disturbed, and these gentlemen must "stand pat," even if against their will. This state of affairs is very humiliating, and they are perforce obliged to deny it whenever it is exposed in its naked truth. And yet it is the sad truth.

The infant industries, of which we have heard so much, which required such tender nursing, have fed so well on the American people that they have grown into powerful giants, reaching out to grapple with the world. But the people have found them to be like the white elephant of the story, and they are begging Congress to take back its gift before it eats them out of house and home. But Congress would rather let the elephant continue its present ruinous feeding than undertake the task of toning down its appetite.

A proposition for tariff revision would threaten the source of supply of these industrial giants and would arouse them to furious indignation. Their one tender spot is the fact that the people are always disposed to interfere in their private business; and a tariff discussion is such an exquisite tickling of that spot that they almost explode in an apoplectic fit.

It may not be uninteresting, in this connection, to state that I had the pleasure as well as the honor of living in the city of Pittsburg for many years and know something about the gentlemen connected with the various protected industries. Away back in 1864 or 1865 two brothers and a friend purchased a half interest in a small iron mill of an old neighbor of mine, Mr. Anthony J. Kloman. The interest did not cost them a very large sum, and they did not have much money at that time. The protection afforded that industry by a paternal government has kept at least one of the brothers, who is now living, busy in the establishment of public libraries all over these United States in order to get rid of his surplus yearly income. He is a most estimable gentleman and lives in my city, has a mansion that covers a whole block in the most fashiouable street, and a castle across the water, in his native land, Scotland. I am not in a position to say how many hundred millions that gentleman is worth, but I do know that if the men in his mills had received even and exact justice in the matter of wages he would not be so busily engaged to-day in spending his money.

In 1875, in conversation with Captain Jones, then superintendent of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, in the town of Braddock, I saw and was pointed out a young man in overalls, working as a laborer, who had recently come from Loretto, Pa., where his father was engaged as a liveryman in conducting a small stable. I find no fault with him for that; he deserves a great deal of credit for it; but later he was wondering how to spend his millions, until he was caught in the shipbuilding trust and was obliged to take a rest for a time.

The protection afforded him in the shape of the duty on iron and steel gave him the opportunity to accumulate money in a way which in no other industry in this land would it have been possible to make the millions that my good friend has been spending. [Applause.] In 1875 I had the honor of renting desk room in my office in the city of Pittsburg to a gentleman standing high in the councils to-day of the great steel trust. He paid me $10 a month. This, remember, was in 1875, when that gentleman was in very moderate circumstances indeed, but to-day could write his check for a hundred million or more without very much trouble. It was made in the steel industry and in the great steel corporation of this country and in the coke regions. [Applause.] Is it any wonder that the gentleman from Massachusetts is asking that something be done for the people at home and not all for the people in the Orient? It seems to me to be a very pertinent question, though I presume it might be regarded as impertinent; but why is it, Mr. Chairman, that we find the tobacco and sugar interests selected as victims in this case? Why not take the steel, glass, lumber, hides, and other equally protected industries and make this rule applicable to them for the benefit of our own people? [Applause.] We would find great trouble in getting Members from Pennsylvania and Ohio to vote for it. Now, the assertion is made, has been a campaign slogan for years, that you must have this high protective tariff to protect the laboring man. I say now that that is not true, for the reason that when a few years ago the puddlers in the steel mills of Pittsburg were getting $5.50 a ton for puddling, the same work was done in your section, Mr. Chairman, for $3.50 a ton, and we tried to find out why it was so, that in Harrisburg, Pottsville, Reading, and Pottstown the rate of wages was so much less—40 per cent—than was paid for the same work at Pittsburg, Wheeling, and in Ohio. We discovered that at the places named a magnificent labor organization, the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, was in existence, and that they held the manufacturers accountable for the wages paid, whereas in your section, Mr. Chairman, and elsewhere in the East there was no such association at that time.

Now, if the protective tariff helps the workingman, it should have protected them equally in one section with another; but I find that is not the case.

But if revision had finally been agreed to, the war of the giants would begin among themselves. The thousand and one protected interests would struggle to see which would keep most of the present advantages, and of course the stronger would win; the weak ones would be offered as a sacrifice to the people, so that the others might continue on their ravenous way unmolested. Such a picture is painted in vivid colors as a warning to those who want revision; they are told to gaze upon it, and determine if they want such a war precipitated.

But while it would create a terrible noise in the land, it would after all be only a rending of each other by overgorged giants; and when the noise had died down and the smoke of the battle had cleared, the people could bury the carcasses and find themselves relieved of their white elephant.

But we have been notified that there will be no revision; therefore all appeals in that direction will be useless. The Saginaw Valley Lumber Dealers' Association, at their last annual meeting, adopted some resolutions, in which they claimed that "the white-pine forests of this country are annihilated." From other sources the same statement is made, and all authorities seem to agree that white pine has gone the way of the bison and other extinct things. The manufacturing industries depending upon a supply of this wood are demanding the removal of the tax on it, so that they may be able to obtain material from Canada and prevent the ruin of their enterprises.

This tax can not reasonably protect an interest which is practically dead, and its continuance will kill a whole class of industries depending on white pine. Yet it is written that they shall perish, for a discussion of their grievance might bring to light many similar ones and the whole tariff question might have to be taken up. This can not be thought of; therefore these industries must perish, a sacrifice on the altar of tariff peace.

We are all familiar with the demand of the artists for the removal of the duty on works of art. The former is an example where a previous excuse for protection no longer exists, but this latter is a case of where an excuse never existed. Here we find the entire protected class vehemently denouncing the protection and begging to be relieved of it; and surely they are the judges of the effect of their protection. We know that the abolition of this tax would not affect the revenues, since the income it brings is ridiculously small, and in no way can it be defended as a just tax. And yet these artists will continue to be protected against their will, because a discussion of their grievance might serve as an entering wedge for a general tariff discussion.

In March our reciprocal arrangements with Germany will expire, and as no new arrangement is in sight we can expect Germany to place a tariff on the products we sell to her. Other European nations are preparing to follow the same course, which is simply our own. They are taking our own lesson to heart and are erecting tariff walls for the protection of their own industries. Germany's action means the loss or serious crippling of some $40,000,000 of trade in foodstuffs. If we let down the bars a little to German manufacturers this trade will not be disturbed; if we keep up our bars Germany will also erect hers.

Our farmers, whose products are thus threatened, will arise and demand protection—something heretofore unheard of on their part. But they will be met with a stern refusal; a reciprocal tariff to favor their interests can not be considered, for it would mortally offend our American manufacturers, and might accidentally cause a general tariff discussion. How proud we have been of our farmers heretofore; what a fine example they have set their fellow-countrymen! Buying what they needed in the home market, necessarily the dearest because of the tariff, they have sold their products in the cheapest markets, because they had to compete with the world. They never complained, never asked for protection, were happy, and contented.

But now, when they realize the need of protection, and ask a favor for the first time, they will immediately fall from grace and be covered with reproaches. How can they have the heart to ask for protection, when it can be given only at the expense of our poor manufacturers! No, they must try to make ends meet in some other way; perhaps they can find some other nation which might take their threatened food stuffs and agree not to adopt the iniquitous American system of raising the tariff against them.

The district which I have the honor of representing is one which nature has most bountifully favored. It has an immense water frontage, with navigable rivers and fine harbors; it has hundreds of acres capable of a rich cultivation, with desirable sites for manufacturing industries, iron and steel plants, and many other activities. Its natural advantages have been known and appreciated for years, and when New York City was little more than a town this district was looked to as the site of a future great metropolis. The famous Morris family was especially hopeful and enthusiastic, and gave many evidences of their loyalty to and faith in the district; none more so than Gouverneur Morris, of revered memory.

Many of these hopes are in a fair way to being realized, and it is a particularly happy privilege to be able to represent such a district. But some of its finest advantages are of no use to its people because of present tariff regulations. Its miles of magnificent water front should be crowded with American ships and shipping, and factories and mills should be busy turning out American products; but the high tariff prevents all this.

In common with the New England and coast towns generally, whose mills were forced to close when the tariff was raised on iron and steel, we ask for such reduction of this duty as will give us an opportunity to make another start. But the great steel trust will see to it that our demand gets no further than its mere verbal expression.

Recent history has shown that the only way to stimulate American shipping is to reduce the tariff; this produces a freer trade, with more freight to be carried, and a chance to make a legitimate profit on it; it produces a healthy commerce, taking care of itself, and existing of its own volition. The only American shipping we can have under the existing tariff will consist of empty boats, floating at the expense of the people; an unhealthy commerce, existing only by reason of subsidies.

When, therefore, my district asks for a reduction of the tariff, in order that the freer trade may stimulate the shipping interests and our water front be put to some use, we are confronted with the announcement that no tariff proposition will be listened to. The protected manufacturers of the country must continue to be protected, and our natural advantages and immense possibilities can go to waste.

No matter from what point you approach the question you are met with refusal. Whether the appeal have an international or foreign interest, like the farmers' appeal; a national interest, like that of the artists or manufacturers of wooden articles; like that of the Massachusetts Republicans, or only a local interest, like that of my own district, it is all one to the powers that be; they are going to "stand pat," and no help need be expected.

We are sadly forced to the conclusion that this House no longer represents the people, whose appeals are not heeded therein. These people will soon grow indifferent to it and look for help elsewhere, and if they find it, then the day of this House is at an end. I trust this event will never come to pass, but if it does, future historians will relate that this bulwark of our institutions and of our liberties began to perish on the day that its guardians denied the voice of its people in order to prevent the warring clashes of the few, when they adopted expediency as their guide instead of justice and truth.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, is the morning business over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, the morning business is closed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Idaho to yield to me a few minutes for the consideration of the resolution which I introduced on yesterday, in reference to salaries in Panama.

Mr. GORMAN. It comes up in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. It comes up in order, I think.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the Senator desires to bring up a resolution of which he has given notice?

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to make just a few remarks.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not a matter that will result in protracted discussion?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think not, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to yield for any great length of time, but will cheerfully yield for the consideration of a resolution that will——

Mr. SIMMONS. I think this is the regular order anyhow, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think it is in order at any time after the morning business to call up for consideration—I am not asking unanimous consent—General Orders on the Calendar. But I do not desire to antagonize the Senator for a reasonable length of time.

Mr. FRYE. Was the Senator's resolution offered yesterday?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. And it took its place on the table?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. Then it would this morning be laid before the Senate for consideration under the rule.

Mr. SIMMONS. So I supposed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the resolution did not go over under objection. It was laid on the table on the request of the Senator from North Carolina subject to his call.

Mr. FRYE. To be called up at any time?

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that I would call it up for consideration this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho was recognized by the Chair and has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would cheerfully yield to the Senator from North Carolina for anything except a resolution that will involve protracted discussion or proceed for an indefinite length of time. I am very anxious that the measure I have called up shall be taken up at an early day for consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I do not think this resolution will provoke any discussion. I simply desire to make a short statement, and I do not believe there will be any opposition from any source to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield with the understanding that if it involves any considerable amount of discussion I shall ask that we proceed under the regular order, which, as I understand it, is the bill which I have now called up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the resolution which he introduced yesterday be now considered.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask, merely as a question of order, whether, if a Senator introduces a resolution and requests that it lie upon the table subject to his call, it is not his right to make that call at any time. Under the rule it would come up of itself; and he simply reserves that right to such time as he chooses to exercise it. I merely ask for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that he is of opinion that if the Senator from North Carolina had been first recognized for the purpose of calling up his resolution he would have been in order and his resolution would be entitled to precedence. But the Senator from Idaho was recognized by the Chair first and his motion was stated to the Senate, and is now the business before the Senate. The Senator from Idaho now yields his right to the Senator from North Carolina for the consideration of his resolution provided it does not lead to long debate. The resolution of the Senator from North Carolina will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SIMMONS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the names, and compensation received by each, of every officer, agent, attorney, counsel, solicitor, or other employee of the Panama Canal Commission and the Panama Railroad Company as of date December 1, 1905, where the salary or compensation is $3,000 per annum or over; also the names, salaries, allowances, and expenditures of the board of consulting engineers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire or intend to enter upon any discussion of salaries and methods on the Isthmus in connection with the construction of the canal. In fact, I do not think the Senate or the country is in possession of sufficiently full and reliable information upon those subjects to discuss them with entire fairness to all concerned. In offering this resolution I have no desire to provoke agitation and discussion, and I have no desire to embarrass anybody. My only purpose is to secure for the use of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, of which I am a member, for the Senate and for the country such information as the records of the War Department may disclose upon this subject.

Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood, so far as I am concerned, that while I possibly disagree with the President and the Administration with reference to certain things connected with the policies being pursued upon the Isthmus and in connection with this question of salaries, neither now or at any other time in the future do I intend to engage in any captious criticism of the present or any future Administration that may be charged with the construction of the canal, concerning its policies there, or salaries paid, or anything else. My feeling toward that great work is one of sympathy and not of antagonism.

Now, in this matter of salaries, concerning which I have introduced the resolution, I feel, and I think the American people feel, that owing to the greater cost of living upon the Isthmus, owing to the great hardships and inconvenience that those who live there have to endure, and especially owing to the great danger to the health and to life of people of our race who live upon the Isthmus, the officials and the employees of the Government there are entitled not only to liberal consideration, but to sympathetic consideration in the matter of salaries as well as in many other things.

But, Mr. President, there is a difference, there is a broad difference, between liberality and extravagance, between generosity and waste; and there is a liberality and a generosity which makes for waste—which benefits nobody, neither the giver nor the receiver; and while I believe that the American people will stand for and are willing to be taxed to pay to the officials and employees engaged in the work salaries which under all the conditions and influencing circumstances are liberally remunerative not only for the work which they may perform, but the hardships which they may endure and the dangers which they may incur, I do not believe that the American people are in any humor to tolerate or even to countenance any extravagance or waste or graft or scandal in connection with the prosecution of this great work.

I hold in my hand here, Mr. President, a publication. It is the New York Independent, I believe a weekly publication, containing an article written by Mr. Poultney Bigelow, a man of character, as I am advised, who has recently visited the Isthmus for the purpose of studying the facts and conditions connected with our operations there.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator state to the Senate how long Mr. Bigelow was on the Isthmus studying conditions?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not advised.

Mr. LODGE. I will inform the Senator that he was there from November 29 to December 1.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope, Mr. President, that while he was there his investigations were directed in a way to find out the truth, more so than seems to have been, according to Mr. Bigelow's statement, the investigations of the Secretary of War while he was upon the Isthmus.

Mr. LODGE. He was there twenty-eight hours. I merely wanted to get in the length of time he devoted to the investigation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Within that length of time reasonable information might be obtained with reference to the conditions at Colon and Panama, and it is chiefly with reference to the conditions at these two cities that Mr. Bigelow speaks.

But, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to say that Mr. Bigelow's statements are true. I hope that they are not true. I was merely proposing to state the fact that this gentleman of character, who had gone to the Isthmus for the purpose of making these investigations, had written this article containing certain charges, which I hope are not true and which I am inclined to think exaggerate the situation; for if true, conditions there are scandalous and a reproach to the Administration and the country.

The fact is, Mr. President, this publication became so popular by reason of its containing this article that on Saturday evening when I went into nearly every book and news store in this town to secure it I ascertained that the whole issue which had been sent here had been disposed of, and many of the stores had ordered extra copies, so that I only succeeded in getting it yesterday. I cite that fact merely for the purpose of showing that these and similar charges which have appeared in the press of the country have found lodgment in the public mind, and that the people are considering them, and not for the purpose of asserting or of attempting to support their accuracy or truth. If the Senator from Massachusetts will wait he will see that I am not in sympathy with these and similar charges and that my attitude toward the Administration in the prosecution is not hostile.

Mr. LODGE. I have not read the article. I have read previous articles of Mr. Bigelow, but I have not read this one. I merely wish to ask the Senator if he thinks that a stay on the Isthmus from November 29 to December 1 is really a sufficient time to master the whole subject thoroughly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly, Mr. President, not the whole condition on the Isthmus.

Mr. LODGE. Or to make a report which is of the slightest value.

Mr. SIMMONS. It might be of very great value as to the conditions existing at Colon and Panama, the chief stations on the Isthmus, to which points this investigation was directed. In the three days, Mr. President, during which this gentleman was on the Isthmus he directed his investigations, as I gathered from the article to which I referred, chiefly to the conditions in Colon and in Panama; and he makes the statement that during that time he visited and inspected all the important streets and quarters in these cities; that he went to the camps where our laborers are housed; that he visited various and sundry employees and officials in both cities, and that he had many conferences with leading business men in those cities with reference to the actual conditions on the Isthmus. Statements made by such a man under such circumstances are not to be brushed aside, and when taken in connection with other press criticism of somewhat similar import will receive respectful consideration.

Mr. President, the charge is made by Mr. Bigelow in this article that Panama is full of incompetent and grossly inefficient officials—men in positions of authority for which they are utterly unfit, some of these positions requiring expert knowledge while the occupants possess no expert knowledge. He charges further, together with many other much more serious things perhaps, which I shall not allude to now because they are not pertinent to the line of argument I wish to pursue, that there are officials on the Isthmus who are overpaid, and that there are on the other hand some who are underpaid, according as the official may possess a political or an official pull. In general effect he charges a state of official inefficiency and demoralization on the Isthmus.

Mr. President, as I said before I do not mean to assert the truth or accuracy of these charges, but I do mean to assert here upon this floor that there is in the public mind of this country the impression that there is something radically wrong in the administration of affairs upon the Isthmus, and that there is enough before the public to beget a wish and demand for a thorough and searching investigation into the facts, with a view to ascertaining the true conditions that now exist upon the Isthmus.

Of course, Mr. President, I understand that in the expenditure of so vast a sum of money as will be required to construct the Panama Canal it is perhaps not to be expected that there will be no extravagance, no waste, no graft, no scandal. It would be very remarkable if we should escape these things in connection with the expenditure of this great sum of money; and if these things do occur, but only in isolated cases and infrequently, followed with frank avowal and speedy remedy, I do not think the American people will be disposed to be hypercritical about the matter.

But, Mr. President, it is the duty of the Administration, in my judgment, and especially is it the duty of the Congress, charged with the appropriation of the people's money to carry on this work, to take every possible precaution to guarantee as far as possible the public service against these things. It is probable that no amount of vigilance on the part of the Administration or Congress can altogether prevent these things, but if they can not be avoided they can be minimized. If the Administration does not take the precautions, if the Congress does not take these precautions, then, Mr. President, criticism, harsh criticism, and just criticism of both the Administration and Congress will come from the people whose money and pride are involved in this great enterprise.

Mr. President, the President of the United States has sent us a message, in which he assures us that these statements, with reference to extravagance and incompetence and general official demoralization in the Isthmus, are not true. I hope the President is correctly informed and advised. I congratulate him upon the position which for himself he has taken in this matter. He has said to the country that, so far as he is concerned, he is in the open about it, that he has no concealment, that he courts the fullest investigation. What, then, is the duty of Congress; what, then, is the duty of the Senate with reference to this matter? When the President says that these charges are not true and demands an investigation, is the Senate, is the Congress going to refuse to make that investigation, when it is the only body which can make an investigation which can probe this matter to the bottom, ascertain what the truth is, and give the public the benefit of that information, so that through the instrumentality of publicity, which will be our best guaranty against graft and fraud and corruption down there, we may immediately apply the great corrective remedy of public opinion to the situation—not a public opinion based upon idle gossip; not a public opinion based upon interested and unfounded charges, but a public opinion based upon the facts, the real facts of the situation.

In my opinion it is the duty of Congress in the existing condition to apply the probe, to ascertain the facts and give them to the people, so that a just and righteous public opinion may be created in this country, and that our officials upon the Isthmus may understand that the eyes of the public in America are upon them, and that if they are guilty of wrongdoing upon the Isthmus that wrongdoing will bring upon them the same disgrace and the same condign punishment that would follow similar wrongdoing in this country.

My purpose in asking the indulgence of the Senate this morning was that, while expressing my sympathy with the Administration in this work and my wish to uphold its hands without captious criticism, I thought it the duty of Congress to make this investigation, to the end that the truth might be known and that the public service might be relieved of the embarrassment of these misrepresentations, if they are such, and that our officials on the Isthmus might be put on notice that they are not too far away to escape notice and punishment if they shall prove unfaithful.

Mr. President, in conclusion—and I have said more than I intended to say, for I did not expect to make a statement of more than two minutes when I got the floor—I wish to say that this great constructive work, the greatest which this nation has ever undertaken, the greatest, perhaps, which any nation in the world has ever undertaken, was not undertaken in pursuance of a Republican policy or in pursuance of a Democratic policy; it was undertaken at the behest of the people of this country. I do not think that I should be very far from the truth if I were to say that this Government has never undertaken any great work of a constructive character in all its history in which the people were so thoroughly united and sympathetic as they are as to this work. If success shall attend our efforts upon the Isthmus, neither of the great political parties in this country will be entitled to preferential credit for that success. If failure shall attend our efforts in this regard, neither party, in my judgment, will be entitled to more blame than the other, unless our operations on the Isthmus shall, like those of the French Company, be characterized by extravagance and graft and corruption. In that case, of course, the party responsible for that extravagance and graft and corruption would be justly saddled with the responsibility and odium of our failure.

So far as I am concerned, I hope that nothing has transpired on the Isthmus up to this time to bring discredit upon the enterprise in which we are there engaged. I hope that nothing has occurred there to bring reproach upon this Government; and I want to say right now if the present Administration, or any other future Administration charged with the duty of building this canal, shall do well down there, or shall do even fairly well down there, so far as I am concerned as a member of the Interoceanic Canal Committee, as a member of this Senate, and as a citizen, I shall, without regard to party or party advantage, uphold that Administration though it may be one to which I do not belong and with which upon general lines I have no sympathy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator desire to have made of the resolution?

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

POTOMAC RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. HEYBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, after conference with the Senator from Idaho, he has kindly consented that I may call up the bill (S. 1373) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property.

This bill has several times passed this body and has the indorsement of the Administration. I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up. I think it will occupy but a few moments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. That is an important bill to be considered at this time, and one which I think will lead to some debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa objects.

Mr. DANIEL. Before the bill goes over, I wish to submit the amendments which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendments intended to be proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill, on page 1, line 5, by striking out the word "of" and inserting the words "upon or near;" in the same line, after the word "the," by inserting the word "old," and in lines 5 and 6, by striking out the words "or adjacent thereto;" so that if amended the bill will read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a memorial bridge from the most convenient point upon or near the old Naval Observatory grounds across the Potomac River to the most convenient point of the Arlington estate property, the said bridge to be constructed on a plan to be approved by a board composed of the Secretary of War, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives, and not to cost more than $5,000,000. And the Secretary of War is authorized to expend so much of the amount hereinafter appropriated as may be necessary for the purpose in securing and determining on a proper plan, opening the competition to all who may desire to submit plans.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing and determining on a proper plan and to commence the construction of said memorial bridge.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made to the present consideration of the bill, it will go over.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I submit that this bill is one of very great interest to all the people of the country in their homes and home life. I think it is only a question in this body as to whether this bill accomplishes what this body desires to accomplish. It is merely a question as to whether its provisions are fair to all of the people, those who manufacture, those who sell, and those who use the ordinary commodities of life. Committees of this body have been endeavoring for many years to reach a conclusion and to formulate a bill that would accomplish this purpose, and we sincerely hope that we have reached that point.

It has seemed to the committee in presenting this bill that the first consideration was to prevent the manufacture of articles that were deleterious to health and to prevent the combination of articles that would deceive and defraud the public. That was the primary object of the committee in preparing this bill.

Mr. President, I shall occupy but a few moments of the Senate's time in stating the general features of this bill. It has not been read, and perhaps it will not be necessary to take the time needed to read it, inasmuch as it will be considered practically by sections.

The first section of the bill provides that it shall be unlawful to manufacture forbidden or proscribed articles. It prescribes a fine and imprisonment against the manufacturer of such articles; it provides that for the first offense the party shall be fined not to exceed $500, or shall be sentenced to one year's imprisonment or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and for each subsequent offense on conviction he shall be fined not less than $1,000 or sentenced to one year's imprisonment or both, at the discretion of the court. That applies to the manufacturer who makes and sells such articles.

Section 2 of the bill provides against the introduction of forbidden articles from one State or Territory or district or insular possession into another jurisdiction, and prescribes practically the same fine for the introduction of the articles as it does for the manufacture of them.

Then there is a new feature to this bill that has not been heretofore embodied in any bill that has been introduced, so far as I know, in regard to the manner of the execution of the law. Section 2, on page 3, provides:

That in the case of any violation of the provisions of the foregoing two sections by any corporation, the fines and penalties imposed therefor may be enforced against the officers of such corporation personally responsible for such violation, and any violation of any of the provisions of this act by any corporation shall be deemed to be the act of the officer of such corporation directly responsible therefor, and such officer may be punished for such violation as though such violation was the personal act of such officer.

That is a new feature in bills of this kind. It was intended to obviate the possibility of escape by the officers of a corporation under a plea, which has been more than once made, that they did not know that this was being done on the credit of or on the responsibility of the corporation.

There is another innovation, or rather a new feature, in the beginning of section 3, which provides a different method for the collection of specimens from which to make a determination as to the character of the article. Heretofore it was provided that this should be done under rules and regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture; but we find, as a practical matter, that the Secretary of Agriculture can not make and enforce rules in the other coordinate bureaus of the Government. So it is provided here—

That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall make uniform rules and regulations for the collection and examination of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors manufactured or offered for sale in the District of Columbia, or in any other district, Territory, or insular possession of the United States, or which shall be offered for sale, etc.

It provides that those three Departments—the Treasury, Agriculture, and Commerce and Labor—shall make rules jointly covering the manner of collecting specimens for determination. That became necessary from a consideration of the application of those several Departments to the subject-matter of this bill. We find that the Treasury Department must make its investigations at the custom-houses and other branches particularly under its control; and it would be neither right nor proper that any Department of the Government should undertake to make rules to be executed by another Department of the Government. So that the Secretary of the Treasury, cooperating with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, will make rules sufficient for the execution of the purposes of this act so far as the collection of specimens is concerned. That was the object of requiring the joint action of these three Departments of the Government. It did not appear that any other Departments of the Government than those three would be necessarily involved in the collection of these specimens.

Then it is provided that, after such specimens are collected, the determination shall be made by the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture. While we have minor bureaus of chemistry under the Government, yet the combination of accommodations for that purpose is in the Department of Agriculture. The peculiar functions of that Department require a more thorough equipment than that of any other Department of the Government. So that after these specimens are collected, they are all submitted to the determination of the Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture.

Another new feature in this bill is that we have separated liquors from foods. Heretofore the proposed measures have denominated all liquors, wines, and so forth as food. It did not appear to the committee reporting this bill that they should be so classified. Liquor is not a food necessary for the maintenance or sustenance of the human frame. If anything, it is a luxury. But, however much difference of opinion there may be upon that subject, it was eminently unfair to that great portion of the people who do not believe that liquor is a necessity, to classify liquors with foods in determining a great question of this kind. So we have separated them, and, as an independent part of this bill, provided for a method appropriate to the determination of the standard of purity and helpfulness of liquors.

Those are the new features of this proposed legislation. The spirit of the bill is crystallized—if that is an appropriate term—in the responsibility that is primarily placed upon the manufacturer of these forbidden articles. The first intendment of the bill is to prevent the making of them. Of course, we can not presume that the bill if enacted would be entirely successful in accomplishing that purpose. So we have provided that, if they are made and put upon the market, they may be detected and be driven from the market or excluded from sale.

As to the necessity for this legislation, I think it would be a waste of time to do more than suggest it. Nearly every State in the Union, Mr. President, has a pure-food law. The States have undertaken to legislate upon this subject, with, I believe, but one or two exceptions. Some of the laws upon the subject are very meager; some of them are very local; some of them are adapted to the peculiar local interests of the people of the particular State, but, as a rule, the States have enacted intelligent and appropriate legislation upon this question. Their difficulty, which has been made plain to the committee, is that they can enforce the law only to the extent of the impure and adulterated products that are sent in unbroken packages within their borders from other States. There are a number of fraudulent articles that are under the ban of this legislation, not a pound or ounce of which is offered for sale in the State in which they are manufactured, because they are provided against by the legislation of that State; but they are manufactured in one State and sent to another in unbroken packages under the rule of law that is now established, perhaps forever. So that the State into which they are sent is helpless against the flood of these impure articles sent in unbroken packages under the protection of that rule of law and then offered for sale upon the retail market.

It is impossible for a State effectively to enforce a pure-food law without the cooperation of the General Government. It is obvious that it is only the General Government that can protect us from the influx of deleterious and poisonous articles from foreign countries. That must be done at the port of entry. There we stop such importations. There has been a law for this purpose on the statute book since 1848. That law is enforced, I believe, fairly and, perhaps, as efficiently as it can be under existing statutes and rules, but the proposed legislation fortifies the law of 1848 in providing a better method and more efficient cooperation between the branches of the Government in carrying out the spirit and intent of that law.

Then, again, the distribution of ports of entry in the United States is now such that a port of entry may be far inland, and to these ports come goods from foreign ports manufactured in foreign countries that are in violation not only of every principle of common honesty and fairness and against the safety and protection of the people, but in violation of the law of our land. These importations go far inland to ports of entry in unbroken packages; there the lid is taken off and these deleterious articles are abroad in the land.

To what extent does this affect the efficiency and the ability to execute the law of a State having good laws on this subject? There are ports of entry in the West in States that prohibit the manufacture or sale or distribution of these impure articles and do so efficiently, except as against outside interference. There is the point of necessity for the cooperation of the General Government with the States in the enforcement of this class of legislation. It is merely a question whether or not Congress will extend a helping hand for the enforcement of the laws of the States in the interest of the people so far as this class of imposition is concerned.

I will not at this time undertake to enumerate the frauds perpetrated upon the people further than to state that, according to a statement which I have before me, received this morning, which is from an official source, in some of the great neighboring States more than 60 per cent of all the drugs that are offered on the market are fraudulent, and not only do they not possess the qualities for which the drug is distinguished, or should be, but they are actually adulterated to such an extent that they are dangerous to be used.

Perhaps during the consideration of this bill the details in regard to this matter may become necessary to be discussed; but at this time, assuming that it is obvious, that it is conceded, if the States of the Union have undertaken to protect their people against this kind of imposition, that Congress can not do less than to meet them halfway and to protect the States against the importation within their borders of foreign articles against which they deem it wise to protect their people, I do not consider it necessary to enter into that discussion now.

The bill has been on the Calendar for some time, and there have been no amendments proposed to it other than one or two immaterial or small committee amendments. It is doubtless true that some Senators will have amendments to propose, but I think that with this opening statement I will submit for this time the bill to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat—I am on the committee that reported the bill, but, unfortunately, was not able to attend the meetings of the committee—I will ask the Senator if in any amendments that have been made to the bill the provision that was so strongly opposed, as I remember, by the late Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt, which, it was said, imposed hardships upon retailers of food and drugs, making them amenable to the law for selling what, in the very nature of things, they could not know were adulterated products—I will ask the Senator if any change has been made in the bill that places upon the manufacturer the onus and penalizes him rather than the innocent retailer, who may not really have been at fault? I have not had time to examine the bill, Mr. President, I will say, and that is the reason I make the inquiry.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that I think we have amply provided against that. The bill provides that where a retailer or any person other than the manufacturer can produce a certificate from the manufacturer that the article is not adulterated it would be evidence of his having purchased in good faith, and that he shall not be prosecuted, provided that he discloses the source from which he received the goods. Then the bill provides that the prosecution shall be against the party primarily responsible.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which is the manufacturer?

Mr. HEYBURN. Which is the manufacturer. The provision was introduced to cover that point, and, I think, does adequately cover it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me a moment—it also provides that the contents shall be disclosed upon the package.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire simply to ask a question. What different provision is made in this bill from the provision contained in the bill of last year as to imported articles?

Mr. HEYBURN. The provision is redrawn. The Senator refers to medicines and drugs?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill contains all that was contained in the bill of last session with some additional provisions or restrictions. But I would say to the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. If the bill contains all——

Mr. HEYBURN. It contains the spirit of that bill.

Mr. SPOONER. If the bill contains all that was in the bill of last session, I think there is objection to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it may be objectionable to the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. I want to be fair. I wish the Senator would indicate briefly, if he can, first, whether the structure of this bill and the theory upon which it is drawn are the same as the bill of last year, and how far it differs from that bill in four or five particulars in which it was criticised by the then Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt, and found objectionable by some of the rest of us. The Senator will remember the things which troubled us.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should be glad if the Senator would direct my attention to the particular part of the bill to which he refers.

Mr. SPOONER. It would oblige me to direct the Senator's attention to pretty much the whole bill. I thought he might state briefly the difference between this bill and the bill of last year.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should be very glad to enter into a comparative analysis of the bills, but I would suggest to the Senator that unless there is some particular point in his mind with reference to the present bill it would be rather a fruitless thing.

Mr. SPOONER. My recollection, for instance, is that the old bill, so far as it related to imported articles, made it dangerous for a merchant residing in the interior who had imported or who had purchased goods from an importer to rely upon the fidelity and utility of the investigation made under the Agricultural Department and by its agencies into this very matter of purity before the admission of the articles into the commerce of this country. That was one point.

Mr. HEYBURN. That would go to the penal clause of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. The whole bill went to penal clauses. The bill was one of penalties, as I presume this bill is, and as every bill upon the subject must be. The objection there was that it imposed a penalty which under certain circumstances was an unjust penalty. Suppose, under this bill, I import a box of drugs from a foreign country, which I understand is examined under existing law at the point of entry by the agents of the Agricultural Department——

Mr. HEYBURN. Of the Treasury Department.

Mr. SPOONER. Of the Treasury Department, with reference to its purity. Would I, under this bill, have any protection against the penalty there, having based my subsequent action upon a belief that the agents of the Government had honestly discharged their duties, and that the fact that the article had been permitted to leave the port of entry or the custody of the Government officials, so as to come to me to be put into the commerce of the country, gave me good warrant, without liability of punishment, to put it on the market?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer the Senator that in order to cover just such cases this bill differs from the bill of last session in that in line 22, page 2, it uses the word "knowingly" as applied to just such cases.

Mr. SPOONER. That is one of the questions I wanted the Senator to answer and which he had not answered, but now has. That is a great improvement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. The committee has been somewhat criticised for inserting the word "knowingly," but it was done to meet the objections made by the Senator on the former consideration of this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. But there is a distinction as to the use of the word "knowingly" in that connection and the use of the word "knowingly" in so far as it relates to the use of a product manufactured in this country.

Mr. HEYBURN. We only use the word "knowingly" as applied to receiving within the Territories, States, etc.

Mr. SPOONER. But there is a distinction between goods received from abroad, which have already been examined, or at least for which the Government has paid to have an examination made, and goods going from one State into another State, which have not been subjected to governmental examination. There a different rule might very well apply.

Mr. HEYBURN. With the permission of the Senator I will read the provision.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. If it would not interrupt the Senator, I suggest that the whole bill had better be read after the Senator has called attention to the clause he has in mind.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has not been read. I did not ask that it be read.

Mr. LODGE. It will have to be read some time.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will understand me; I am not asking these questions out of any hostility to the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thoroughly understand that, and I am glad to have the attention of the Senate directed to these provisions in order that they may be made perfectly plain.

I read from the provision beginning in line 18 on page 2:

> And any person, association of persons, or corporation who shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State, Territory, district, or insular possession to any other State, Territory, district, or insular possession, or shall export—

There is no "knowingly" there. A man is bound to know what he himself does. The word "knowingly" is not used. The responsibility is upon every man to know that he is not going to injure his neighbor. But take the next sentence:

> or offer to export the same to a foreign country, or who shall knowingly receive in any State, Territory, district, or insular possession of the United States from any other State, Territory, district, or insular possession of the United States, or from any foreign country, or who, having received—

"Knowingly." "Knowingly" is not in there, but the "knowingly" I have used relates to the whole sentence—> shall deliver in original, unbroken packages, or shall offer to deliver to any other person, persons, or corporation any such article, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction for such offense shall be fined, etc.

That was intended to meet the objection which was urged against innocent parties being made the victims of this legislation, and the distinction was drawn clearly between the person whom the law presumes to know and the person who might be imposed upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest in line 1, page 3, the insertion of the word "knowingly;" so as to read, "or who having knowingly received." I think that is very important.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the word is not carried clear through the sentence it might be well to repeat it, but I think on technical examination it will be found that the word is carried throughout the sentence.

Mr. LODGE. It would do no harm to put it in.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; and I shall not object to its insertion, because it is intended to be there.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course in a statute which carries penalties against the citizen, and plenty of them, we ought not to be so economical in the use of words as to engender the slightest possible doubt.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I will move to amend it by inserting in line 1, on page 3, after the word "having," the word "knowingly."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. In reference to the importation of goods, I will say that our present law, so far as drugs and medicines and that class of articles are concerned, is a very good law, and it is enforced through the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department cooperates with the Bureau of Chemistry in the performance of its work, although it is equipped to a certain extent for the performance of independent work. I have not deemed it necessary, in drawing this bill, to go beyond the necessities outside of the provisions of existing law.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer three amendments to the bill, all to be printed on one sheet, and I ask to have them printed in the RECORD also. Then let them go over, so that they may be considered when the bill shall be voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

The amendments submitted by Mr. LODGE are as follows:

> Insert on page 8, end of line 9: "Provided further, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption."
> On page 9, line 2, and after the word "character," insert "and the amount of alcohol, if any, contained in them."
> On page 10, end of line 6, after the word "imitation," insert "and to show the amount, if any, of alcohol, contained in them."

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest that the bill be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. It ought to be read.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not up for action. Let the bill be printed in the RECORD as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the bill be printed in to-morrow's RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person, association of persons, or corporation within any Territory, District, or insular possession of the United States, to manufacture, sell, offer for sale, or deliver for shipment, or to cause to be delivered, shipped, or transported from within any State, Territory, District, or insular possession to any State, Territory, District, insular possession, or foreign country any article of food, drugs, medicines, or liquors which is adulterated or misbranded, or which contains any poisonous or deleterious substance within the meaning of this act; and any person, association of persons, or corporations who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each offense shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not to exceed $500, or shall be sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and for each subsequent offense and conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000, or sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That the introduction into any State, Territory, District, or insular possession, from any other State, Territory, District, or insular possession, or from any foreign country, or the shipment to any foreign country of any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded, deleterious or poisonous, within the meaning of this act, is hereby prohibited; and any person, association of persons, or corporation who shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State, Territory, District, or insular possession to any other State, Territory, District, or insular possession, or shall export or offer to export the same to a foreign country, or who shall knowingly receive in any State, Territory, District, or insular possession of the United States from any other State, Territory, District, or insular possession of the United States, or from any foreign country, or who, having knowingly received, shall deliver in original unbroken packages, or shall offer to deliver to any other person, persons, or corporation any such article, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction for such offense shall be fined not exceeding $500 for the first offense, and upon conviction of each subsequent offense shall be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

That in the case of any violation of the provisions of the foregoing two sections by any corporation, the fines and penalties imposed therefor may be enforced against the officers of such corporation personally responsible for such violation, and any violation of any of the provisions of this act by any corporation shall be deemed to be the act of the officer of such corporation directly responsible therefor, and such officer may be punished for such violation as though such violation was the personal act of such officer.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall make uniform rules and regulations for the collection and examination of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors manufactured or offered for sale in the District of Columbia, or in any other district, Territory, or insular possession of the United States, or which shall be offered for sale in unbroken packages in any State other than that in which they shall have been respectively manufactured or produced, or which shall be received from any foreign country, or intended for shipment to any foreign country, or which may be submitted for examination by the chief health officer of any State, Territory, District, or insular possession, and at any domestic or foreign port through which such product is offered for interstate commerce or for export or import between the United States and any foreign port or country.

SEC. 4. That the examinations of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such article is adulterated or misbranded, or contains any poisonous or other substance deleterious to the health of human beings or domestic animals; and if it shall appear from any such examination that such specimens are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added poisonous or deleterious substance or ingredient injurious to human health when used in the prescribed or usual manner of use of such article, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the parties from whom such samples were obtained, and public notice of the facts shall be given by publication in such manner as the rules and regulations may prescribe to all other persons, association of persons, or corporations in whose possession like articles may be found or known to be that such article is within the provision of this act; and shall give such party as may be charged with violation of this act an opportunity to be heard, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed as aforesaid, and if after such hearing it is found that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by such parties, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis or the examination of such article, duly authenticated by the analyst or officer making such examination, under the oath of such officer.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Agriculture shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any health officer or agent of any State, Territory, District, or insular possession shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation, to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States, without delay, for the recovery of the fines and the enforcement of the penalties as in such case herein provided.

In case of drugs:

First. If, when a drug is sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary official at the time of investigation: Provided, That no drug not defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof as originally packed.

That such drug shall be deemed to be misbranded:

First. If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the name of another article.

If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the country, State, or Territory, or place therein, in which it is manufactured or produced, or if the contents of the original package shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package.

In the case of confectionery an article shall be deemed to be adulterated:

If it contain terra alba, barytes, talc, chrome yellow, or other mineral substances or poisonous colors or flavors, or other ingredients deleterious or detrimental to health.

In the case of food an article shall be deemed to be adulterated:

First. If any substance or substances has or have been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength.

An article of food shall be deemed to be misbranded:

First. If it is to be offered for sale under the name of another article: Provided, That the term "distinctive name" shall not be construed as applying to any article sold or offered for sale under a name that has come into general use to indicate the class or kind of the article if the name be accompanied on the same label or brand with a statement of the place where said article has been manufactured or produced.

Fifth. An article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded in the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now, or from time to time hereafter, known as articles of food sold under their own distinctive names and not included in definition first of misbranded articles of food in this section, or in the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that they are mixtures, compounds, combinations, imitations, or blends: Provided, That the same shall be labeled, branded, or tagged so as to show that they are of such character: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary goods which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their formulas of production except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation.

In the case of liquors, an article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any added ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character.

Such liquors shall be deemed misbranded:

First. If it is blended or rectified, or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains, or is mixed with, other substances, and such fact is not plainly stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale, or if the label or any written or printed statement accompanying the package in which such liquor is kept or sold contains any false statement as to the character of the contents of such package, or represents such liquor to be the product of any other country than that in which it was actually produced.

SEC. 10. That no dealer shall be convicted under the provisions of this act when he can establish a guaranty signed by the wholesaler, jobber, manufacturer, or other party residing in the United States, from whom he purchases such articles, to the effect that the same is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, designating such article. Said guaranty, to afford protection, shall contain the name and address of the party or parties making the sale of such articles to such dealer, and in such case said party or parties shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach, in due course, to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. That every person, association of persons, or corporation who manufactures or produces and delivers for interstate or foreign shipment or transportation, or who receives from any State, Territory, district, or insular possession or foreign country other than the State, Territory, district, or insular possession in which it is produced, and any person, association of persons, or corporation who sells or exposes for sale in any Territory, district, or insular possession any article of food, drug, or liquor, shall furnish, within business hours and upon tender and full payment of the selling price, a sample of such drug, article of food, or liquor, to any person duly authorized by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to receive the same, and in any Territory, district, or insular possession, to any officer or agent of such Territory, district, or insular possession, respectively, charged with the inspection of food or drugs in such jurisdiction who shall apply to such manufacturer, producer, or person or association of persons, or corporation selling or exposing for sale as aforesaid such drug, article of food, or liquor for such sample in sufficient quantity for an analysis of any such article or articles in his or their or its possession.

And any person, association of persons, or corporation, found guilty of manufacturing or offering for sale, or selling, any adulterated, impure, or misbranded article of food, drug, or liquor in violation of the provisions of this act shall be adjudged to pay, in addition to the penalties hereinbefore provided for, all the necessary costs and expenses incurred in inspecting and analyzing such adulterated articles which said person may have been found guilty of manufacturing, selling, or offering for sale.

SEC. 13. That any article of food, drug, or liquor that is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, and is being transported from one State, Territory, District, or insular possession, to another for sale, or, having been transported, remains unloaded, unsold, or in original unbroken packages, or if it be sold or offered for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or insular possessions of the United States, or if it be imported from a foreign country for sale, or if it is intended for export to a foreign country, shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same is found, and seized for confiscation by a process of libel for condemnation. And if such article is condemned as being adulterated or misbranded, or of a poisonous or deleterious character, within the meaning of this act, the same shall be disposed of by destruction or sale, as the said court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, if sold, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, but such goods shall not be sold in any jurisdiction contrary to the laws of that jurisdiction: Provided, however, That upon the payment of the costs of such libel proceedings and the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient bond to the effect that such articles shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of contrary to the provisions of this act, or the laws of any State, Territory, District, or insular possession, the court may by order direct that such articles be delivered to the owner thereof. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States.

SEC. 14. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States.

SEC. 15. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to common carriers as such, or to their servants, agents, or employees, acting for said common carriers.

SEC. 16. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the 1st day of July, 1906.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I feel that as a member of the Committee on Manufactures, from which this bill was reported, I owe myself the duty of very critically examining it before it is finally passed upon.

I only rise now for the purpose of saying that I am exceedingly gratified to know that the committee has inserted the word "knowingly" in section 2. That was one of the points which led me during the last session of Congress to feel that I could not vote for the bill in the form in which it then appeared. I think the chairman of the committee and the committee have done a great public service in removing from the minds of some of us, at least, an objection that seemed insurmountable. I presume the bill has in other respects been so carefully guarded that those of us who want to support a bill of this character, who believe in pure food and pure drugs and have no sympathy whatever with those who are adulterating them, will find that they can give it their support.

At any rate, Mr. President, I feel more sanguine than I have ever felt before that we will be able to pass a bill covering this very important subject, which will be of great and lasting benefit to the people of this country. That is all I care to say at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to know from the Senator from Idaho whether any motion is pending before the Senate in regard to this bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. There are only certain amendments which have been submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, and while I am not thoroughly familiar with all of them, so far as I am advised they are amendments which the committee would be inclined to accept, and it may be we can progress with the bill further than we anticipated.

Mr. LODGE. I think my amendments had better be printed and go over until to-morrow, so that the Senator can have an opportunity to look at them. There are two others besides the one I spoke of to the Senator. I do not want to delay the bill in the least. I shall be ready to vote upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Idaho will not attempt to press the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not my intention at all.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a bill which requires, of course, careful examination, and no one not connected with its preparation has had any opportunity to examine it carefully.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that I rose to state that I have no further remarks to make to-day, and that I thought, inasmuch as it was proposed that the bill should be printed in the RECORD and the amendments be printed, that it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will go over until to-morrow.

IMPORTATION OF UNWHOLESOME TEA.

Mr. LODGE. The Calendar is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar is now in order.

The bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897, was announced as the first business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

Mr. LODGE. As the next bill on the Calendar is the pure-food bill, which has just gone over, and the next is the unfinished business, I ask that they may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be passed over.

PUBLIC PARK ON GEORGETOWN HEIGHTS.

The bill (S. 54) to provide a public park on Georgetown Heights, in the District of Columbia, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION.

The bill (S. 1244) to amend section 605 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to corporations, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS POST-OFFICE PAPERS.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2140) to authorize the Postmaster-General to dispose of useless papers in post-offices. The bill was drafted by the Postmaster-General, and it simply authorizes him to dispose of useless papers in post-offices over the country, which your committee can not examine except in a very unsatisfactory way. That is the whole purpose of the bill. The law does not authorize it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN NATIONAL INSTITUTE AT PARIS, FRANCE.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1) to incorporate the American National Institute (Prix de Paris) at Paris, France. A similar bill has been reported three times favorably and unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and has passed the Senate twice. There are two or three amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. I object to the bill being taken up until it is read. I want to have the bill read, and then we can determine whether or not there is objection.

Mr. FRYE. It should be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, which proposes that CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, Thomas Hunter, Count von Daur, and others, their associates and successors, shall be created a body corporate and politic in the District of Columbia, by the name of the American National Institute in Paris, France, with the right to implead and be impleaded, to adopt a constitution, by-laws, and corporate seal. The objects of the corporation are to construct a building in Paris, and there to provide favorable conditions of surroundings and direction for American students, to be admitted under proper certificates of examination of fitness by competition, and to facilitate their studies and training in the arts and sciences, including architecture, sculpture, painting, applied design, music, dramatic art, literature, languages, scientific instruction, and research.

The proposed corporation is empowered to acquire property, both real and personal, in the United States and in France.

It is provided that all gifts and bequests of money to the institute, unless otherwise directed by the donor, shall be invested in United States bonds, so far as may be consistent with the conditions of such gifts and bequests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to hear what the proposed amendments are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, section 6, line 8, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to insert "or such place as may be decided upon;" in line 10, after the word "Congress," to strike out "or such place as may be decided upon;" and in line 12, after the word "institute," to insert "other than portraits;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That said corporation or board of regents may send each year to the Library of Congress, or such place as may be decided upon, subject to the approval of the Joint Committee on the Library of the two Houses of Congress, such works of the students of the institute, other than portraits, as may be agreed upon between the jurors of the American National Institute and the board of regents as suitable for preservation and exhibition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. It is utterly impossible for anyone to determine, from hearing a bill read in this manner, whether it is objectionable or not. If this were a business proposition I should certainly object. It seems to be otherwise, and I am not going to object to it; but I do not want to give my assent to some things that I think are in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which have been stated.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. There is another amendment. In section 1, line 5, page 1, after the word "Wheeler," I move to insert "Levi P. Morton."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. In the same section, line 8, after the word "New York," I move to insert "and Phœbe Hearst, State of California."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. There are no other amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question. I have no objection to the bill; I am in entire sympathy with its purpose; but why should section 5 be in the bill? It seems to me the tendency of it is to mislead foreigners as to the relation of this institute or institution to this Government; and that ought, by all means, to be avoided. It is a purely private establishment. It is not an agency governmental in any sense. It is a wise and kindly purpose, but private. The fact that it is created by Congress is enough, and to go on and permit it to make reports to the Secretary of State, which reports, in whole or in part, are to be solemnly communicated to Congress, I can see, and the Senator can, I think, on reflection, will suggest in the minds of people not entirely familiar with our methods and our affairs the notion that it is a national affair, governmental in some respects. So I think, if the Senator does not regard it as important——

Mr. FRYE. I do not regard it as at all important to the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I suggest that it be stricken out, and that the portion of section 6 which refers—that is all right.

Mr. FRYE. I think that is all right.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest that section 5 be stricken out.

Mr. FRYE. It may be stricken out. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 5, in the following words:

SEC. 5. That said corporation may send annually a report to the Secretary of State, who shall communicate to Congress such portion thereof as he may deem of national interest and importance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out section 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not disturb the bill any further.

Mr. SPOONER. I was merely going to make a suggestion to the Senator from Maine, and if he does not agree to it I shall not insist upon it. I am friendly to the purpose of the bill. Why the limitation as to United States bonds?

Mr. FRYE. Because, I suppose, those bonds are perfectly safe, and would be regarded in France as perfectly safe. The Senator is aware that the city of Paris, whenever this institute has been incorporated by the United States, is to make a present of a site—for the building to be erected upon it—worth three or four hundred thousand dollars, and that is one great necessity why the bill ought to be passed at an early date.

I have had experience with these American students. I had the honor of addressing fifteen hundred of them one Sabbath evening, and if there are any Americans in the world who are entitled to our sympathy and to everything we can do for them, they are the American art students in the city of Paris.

Mr. SPOONER. I quite agree with that. I have had something to do with this subject hitherto, and I discovered a purpose, legitimate enough from the standpoint of the promoters of the institute—and I use the word "promoters" in a good sense, of course—so to draft this measure as to give it every possible semblance of connection with the United States Government; and I fancy that this restriction in section 7, following some other provisions, especially that in section 5, is intended partly for that purpose.

There are plenty of bonds in the world that are adequate security. This is a purely private institute. It is to be created by Congress as a corporation of the District of Columbia, we have entire jurisdiction over the District, and that ought to be enough. I do not see why Congress should undertake to limit the investment by this institute to United States Government bonds. I undertake to say there is no purpose on earh for inserting it in the bill except to create a presumption that this is more of a governmental institution than Congress intends.

Mr. FRYE. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken in his suggestion. That is in the interest of the people from whom very large benefactions are expected. Take the names in the bill. Those people are intensely interested in the erection of this building and in this institution which it is proposed to establish. They themselves would feel very much safer in making large contributions if they knew the money was to be invested where it would be perfectly safe. The provision is put in the bill for that purpose and no other.

Mr. SPOONER. It could be put in the by-laws of the company.

Mr. FRYE. This measure has been before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations three times. It has been reported unanimously. It has been very carefully examined by the committee, and the Senator from Wisconsin was present when it was considered.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I am not opposing the bill, but I think that had better be out. The Senator might say "United States or other bonds;" so as to exclude stocks, which are more precarious.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest that it read "United States or other safe bonds."

Mr. ALLISON. That is better.

Mr. TELLER. What is the phraseology suggested?

Mr. FRYE. "United States or other safe bonds."

Mr. SPOONER. I agree to that.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POTOMAC RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1373) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. I think the bill had better go over. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] objected to it this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to and goes over.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF ARMY.

The bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCOTT. As the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, is not present, I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

Mr. FRYE. Retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Retaining its place on the Calendar.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT OF ARMY.

The bill (S. 1540) to increase the efficiency of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army was next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. That will also go over.

Mr. SCOTT. Let this bill also go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT YANKTON, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 979) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak., was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT. My colleague [Mr. ELKINS] is detained at home by sickness and unable to be present. I ask that the bill may go over, retaining its place.

Mr. GAMBLE. This is a bill with which I have entire familiarity and acquaintance. The senior Senator from West Virginia simply reported it.

Mr. SCOTT. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GAMBLE. He is not interested in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "four," to insert "as amended by the act approved February 11, 1905;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of "An act authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak.," approved April 5, 1904, as amended by the act approved February 11, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the time within which the said bridge is required to be commenced shall be within one year and the time within which it is required that said bridge shall be completed shall be within three years from the date of the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE DEAD.

The bill (S. 1234) to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes, was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary again read that part of the bill relating to the compensation of the commissioner.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to appoint some competent person as commissioner to ascertain the location of such Confederate graves not heretofore located, and to compare the names of those already marked with the registers in the cemeteries, and correct the same when found necessary, as preliminary to the work of marking the graves with suitable headstones, and to fix the compensation of said commissioner, who shall be allowed necessary traveling expenses.

Mr. HALE. I move to insert, after "commissioner," the words "at not to exceed $2,500 per annum."

Mr. HALE. "At the rate of."

Mr. GALLINGER. It may not be a year.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "commissioner," in line 3, page 3, insert "at a rate not to exceed $2,500 per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I ask that the clause relating to the appropriation in the bill may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That for the carrying out of the objects set forth herein there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is satisfactory, Mr. President. I thought it was not in.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any limit of time in the bill in which this work shall be performed?

Mr. FRYE. No; there is not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There seems to be no limit as to time in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] who sits behind me, that it would be very wise to leave it entirely without limitation as to time.

Mr. GALLINGER. To a commissioner.

Mr. SPOONER. To a commissioner.

Mr. HALE. It might make a perpetual office.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know how long it will naturally take, but I suggest a limitation of two years. I move to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "mentioned," in the fifteenth line, the words "said work to be completed within two years."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator to add "at the end of which a report of the same shall be made to Congress."

Mr. SPOONER. I am quite willing to accept that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 15, after the word "mentioned," strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

The said work shall be completed within two years, at the end of which a report of the same shall be made to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORESTRY LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

The bill (S. 951) to grant to the State of Minnesota certain vacant lands in said State for forestry purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It grants to the State of Minnesota for forestry purposes the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter (80 acres, more or less) of section 6, township 134 north, range 29 west, fifth principal meridian, being vacant public land adapted for forestry purposes and adjoining a forest reserve belonging to the State of Minnesota; but this act shall not prejudice any right to any of the land that may have been acquired by any other party previous to its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SABINE RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 2159) authorizing the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Texas and Louisiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 21, after the words "United States," to insert "and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal, telegraph, and telephone purposes;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States; and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal, telegraph, and telephone purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 4, line 6, after the words "Secretary of War," to insert "and until the plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the structure shall not be commenced;" and in line 11, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "and the said structure shall be changed at the cost and expense of the owners thereof from time to time, as the Secretary of War may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said river, and the authority to erect and continue said bridge shall be subject to revocation by the Secretary of War whenever the public good, in his judgment, so requires;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and erected under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation in said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and to secure that object said railway company, its successors or assigns, shall submit to the Secretary of War for his examination and approval a design or drawing of said bridge, and a map of the location, giving for the distance of one-half mile above and 1 mile below the proposed location the meanders of the river and such other particulars as may be required by the Secretary of War, and until the plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the structure shall not be commenced, and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of the construction thereof such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 17, to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 5. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same and over the approaches thereto upon the payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid and upon the rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegation and proofs of the parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON subsequently said: While I was absent from the Chamber Senate bill 2159, Order of Business 21, was passed with certain Senate committee amendments, which I have not yet had time to examine as carefully as I should like. It is a bridge bill, and rather than have the bill go out of the possession of the Senate I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is a bill to allow the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Sabine River, the boundary line between Texas and Louisiana. I simply want to inquire if the amendments suggested by the Senate Committee on Commerce are satisfactory, and if not, of course I will hear the suggestions and submit the bill again to that committee.

Mr. FRYE. All the amendments suggested to the committee were adopted, I think.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; that is true, but the point is this: I want to see whether these amendments are satisfactory to the authorities of the railroad company who desire to have the bill passed. I did not draw the bill. I have communicated to them, but have not been able to hear from them. I simply enter a motion to reconsider, as a mere matter of form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's motion to reconsider is noted.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read; it has not been read as yet.

Mr. MORGAN. There was a special order. There was a discussion at some time in the past, and at some place in the past, that I am not permitted to mention at all, I believe; but at all events the legislative situation got to be this: By the unanimous consent of this body, a certain proposition was made the regular order of business and displaced the present order that is now being called. I think it is the duty of the Chair, considering the parliamentary position, about which there is no record—no record has been preserved of it—to at least put the Senate in the same shape it was in when it adjourned yesterday evening.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I assure the Senator that I desire to extend to him the utmost possible courtesy in this matter, and if he will allow the bill to be read, which will not take long, I will then ask that it be laid aside, and the other matter can be taken up.

Mr. MORGAN. The matter is not one of the slightest interest to me in the world, except it suggests a parliamentary situation that will grow into a precedent; and I have no right to make any suggestion about it except merely to call for the regular order of the Senate which came over from yesterday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I shall make the point of order that the unfinished business is the regular order of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the point of order is well taken. For the information of the Senator from Alabama the Chair would further state that the resolution to which he made reference went to the Calendar under the rule and can only be taken up upon motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Or by unanimous consent. The bill which is the unfinished business is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will now be read at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, page 12, line 12, paragraph 11, after the word "than," it is proposed to strike out "seventeen" and insert "sixteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Eleventh. From a port of the Pacific coast of the United States via Hawaii and the Samoan Islands to Australasia, on steamships of the United States of not less than 16 knots speed, for a service once in three weeks at a maximum compensation not exceeding $217,000 a year in addition to the compensation now provided pursuant to contract under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I understand that no Senator is prepared to debate this bill to-day, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may be temporarily laid aside and that we proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON. Over here we did not understand the request of the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I made the request that the bill be temporarily laid aside, saying that I understood no Senator was prepared to now address himself to the subject. If any Senator is so prepared, I shall be glad indeed to have him occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Before anything else is done with this measure, I do not want the House of Representatives to be again offended with the Senate and sending back to us revenue bills for us to chew upon. So I raise the point of order on section 8 of this bill, that it is not within the competency of the Senate of the United States to enact a bill "to provide revenue from tonnage," as stated in the title. My reading of the Constitution is that that power belongs exclusively by the express language of the Constitution to the House of Representatives. I raise the point of order upon that section, and the point may go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest, Mr. President, that it is not subject to a point of order. The Senator, of course, can file his caveat that he will oppose that provision of the bill; but before even letting it reach that stage, I will say to the Senator that the suggestion he has made has not escaped the attention of some of the rest of us, and we think we shall find a way out of that difficulty if the difficulty exists.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt of your finding a way out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we shall.

Mr. MORGAN. But my opinion is that such an enactment is not within the power of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to inquire if there is an adverse report accompanying this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] has submitted a minority report. It was not printed early this morning, but it may now be in print. I have not myself seen it, however.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to inquire what became of the point of order raised by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]?

Mr. MORGAN. I have suggested that it might go over with the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Calendar is in order.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent that I may be excused from further service on the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the junior Senator from Washington that he be excused from further service on the Committee on Interoceanic Canals? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused.

Mr. ANKENY. I ask unanimous consent that I may be excused from further service on the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that he may be excused from further service on the Committee on Commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the vacancies created by the resignations of the Senators from Washington may be filled by the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none. The Chair will appoint to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Commerce the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES], and to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Interoceanic Canals the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. ANKENY].

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar is in order.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I ask that the Calendar be proceeded with now under Rule VIII, as it would have been in the morning hour, so that five-minute speeches only shall be allowed and one objection will carry a bill over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

ARKANSAS RIVER BRIDGE AT VANBUREN, ARK.

The bill (S. 2106) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Vanburen, Ark., was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOBILE RAILWAY AND DOCK COMPANY BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1747) to authorize the Mobile Railway and Dock Company to construct and maintain a bridge or viaduct across the water between the end of Cedar Point and Dauphin Island was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 9, after the word "constructed," to insert the word "so;" in line 10, before the word "navigation," to strike out "the," and after the word "navigation," to strike out "of Grants Pass, the channel cut for passage of vessels;" so as to make the section read:

That the Mobile Railway and Dock Company, a corporation created and existing under an act of the general assembly of the State of Alabama, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a railroad bridge for the passage of railway engines and cars across the water between Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, in Mobile County, State of Alabama, said bridge or viaduct to be constructed so as not to obstruct navigation between Mobile Bay and Mississippi Sound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 16, after the word "said," to strike out "bridges" and insert "bridge."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 25, after the words "bridge and," to strike out "drawbridge" and insert "drawbridges;" on page 3, line 7, before the word "wharves," to strike out "drawbridge" and insert "drawbridges;" in line 14, after the word "bridge," to insert "and drawbridges;" in line 16, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "no work upon the bridge, wharves, and docks shall be commenced," and insert "work thereon shall not be commenced;" and in line 18, after the word "bridge," to insert "and drawbridges;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the bridge and drawbridges, wharves, and docks authorized to be constructed under this act shall be located and built and subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of said pass and Mobile Bay as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the proposed bridge and drawbridges, wharves, and docks, and a map of the location giving for the space of one-half mile on each side of said bridge and wharves, the direction and strength of the currents, and the soundings accurately showing the bed of the water, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge and drawbridges, wharves, and docks are approved by the Secretary of War work thereon shall not be commenced; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge and drawbridges, wharves, or docks during the progress of construction or after completion such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 3, after the word "navigation," at the end of line 23, to strike out "of said Grants Pass or" and insert "between Mississippi Sound and;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time; and if at any time navigation between Mississippi Sound and the Bay of Mobile shall in any manner be obstructed or impaired by the said works, the Secretary of War shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to require the said company to alter and change the said works at its own expense, in such manner as may be proper to secure free and complete navigation without impediment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 4, line 6, before the word "Provided," to strike out "draw" and insert "draws."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like my colleague, who is the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to tell us whether there is ever any examination made as to the need of the many bridge bills that are passed. It has struck me that it is a question whether there are rivers enough in the United States to accommodate all these bridges. [Laughter.] I do not know, and therefore I ask my colleague.

Mr. FRYE. If my colleague were on the Committee on Commerce, as I am, he would find that there are not bridges enough to cover the rivers.

Mr. HALE. My point was whether there are rivers enough to accommodate the bridges.

Mr. FRYE. Without any doubt there are many more.

Mr. HALE. That is satisfactory.

Mr. FRYE. These bridge bills are all referred to the Secretary of War; the Secretary of War sends to the committee any amendments he desires made to such bridge bills, and they are reported by the subcommittee and adopted by the committee without any further consideration, the Engineer Corps having, of course, examined into the matter. I do not think it is possible for a bridge bill to get through Congress that is not proper in every respect.

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask the Senator from Maine whether these bridges are not generally railway bridges?

Mr. FRYE. They are generally railway bridges.

Mr. ALLISON. And they will be utilized only by bringing railroads through either end of the bridge.

Mr. FRYE. That is true.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there can be no harm in being reasonably liberal in the authorization of such bridges.

Mr. KEAN. Is the toll fixed that is to be charged on the bridges?

Mr. FRYE. It is not.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the toll will be fixed later on.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1269) granting an increase of pension to Charles Edwin Smith, have examined the same and report:

This bill proposes to increase from $12 to $30 per month the pension of Charles E. Smith, late of Company K, Fourth Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and captain Company A, Fifty-sixth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry.

The papers on file in this case show that Charles E. Smith, the claimant was a good soldier with an honorable record of five years' service. It is shown by the military records that he enlisted October 22, 1861, as a private in Company K, Fourth Minnesota Infantry, and served as such until August 11, 1863, when honorably discharged. He again enlisted August 12, 1863, as hospital steward, Fifty-sixth United States Colored Troops, and was promoted second lieutenant of Company A, same regiment, December 6, 1864. He was promoted captain April 7, 1866, and was honorably discharged and mustered out with his company September 15, 1866.

Soldier might have obtained arrears of pension had he applied in time, but he was self-reliant and independent and he refused to ask aid from the Government until his necessities compelled him to do so. His first application was filed August 30, 1888, from which date he was allowed pension under the general law for malarial poisoning, chronic diarrhea, and piles of service origin at $8 per month, which was finally increased to $12 per month from October 14, 1891. He applied for further increase March 3, 1900, but his application was rejected July 18, 1902, on the ground that his rate was commensurate with the degree of disability from pensioned causes.

Soldier is about 62 years of age, and is completely broken down physically and absolutely incapable of earning his own support. It appears by the last report of the board of examining surgeons, dated April 2, 1902, that he is unable to perform manual labor by reason of physical disabilities. The examining surgeons described his condition as follows:

"Malarial poisoning: Tongue coated, skin sallow and icteroid, whites of eyes icteroid. Abdomen tympanitic, tenderness over liver, stomach, and spleen; those organs not enlarged. Liver nor spleen not palpable. Applicant looks weak and emaciated.

"Diarrhea and piles: Rectum: Skin around anus relaxed; mucous membrane of rectum red and inflamed; presence of much mucous; six internal piles, tumors about the size of a hazlenut; no ulceration, but evidence of old ulcerations.

"Applicant was merchant; palms give no evidence of manual labor. Disabilities are permanent and not due to vicious habits."

Claimant is in destitute circumstances financially and has absolutely no means of support aside from his present pension of $12 per month.

In view of his advanced age, the length and distinguished character of his services (he being promoted from private to rank of captain), his poverty and inability to earn a support by his own manual labor, your committee are of opinion that an increase of his pension to $30 per month, as proposed in the bill, is eminently just and proper.

The bill is therefore reported back favorably with a recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles E. Smith, late of Company K, Fourth Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and captain Company A, Fifty-sixth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 10, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COLD SPRINGS FISH HATCHERY, BULLOCHVILLE, GA.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11036) to provide additional land and provide additional buildings at the Cold Springs fish hatchery, Bullochville, Ga., and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. While the bill relates to a fish hatchery, in point of fact it refers to the subdividing of an appropriation already made in such manner as will effect the purpose for which the bill is intended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11036, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS NO. 2.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 2 be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 3.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be permitted time to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be given time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, the pending measure has been so exhaustively and elaborately discussed by my colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means who have preceded me that I would fain be excused from intruding myself upon the attention of this committee. It seems to me, however, that I owe it to myself that I should put on record the reasons that influence me to support this measure, and in doing so I shall endeavor to confine myself to the discussion of those questions which seem to me to be entirely relevant, and will endeavor to occupy as brief a time as possible. It will not be out of place for me to restate the question at issue.

The measure under discussion is "An act to amend an act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes." By its provisions all of the products of the Philippine Islands are admitted into the United States free of duty except sugar and tobacco, and upon these a duty is imposed equal to 25 per cent of the existing rates under what is known as the "Dingley Act." There is a further provision that after April 11, 1909, ten years after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of Paris, all Philippine products shall be admitted into the United States free of duty.

As the law now stands, Philippine sugar and tobacco pay duties equal to 75 per cent of the Dingley rates, so that this measure, if adopted, will reduce the rates of duty 50 per cent for three years. Prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of "the diamond rings" the full duties provided for by the Dingley Act were imposed and collected on the products of the Philippine Islands. In that case, however, the Supreme Court held that the Philippine Archipelago is not a foreign country, and as a consequence the Dingley rates did not apply. Following this decision the act was passed which imposes the present 75 per cent rate.

As the Philippine Islands are a part of the United States, there ought to be free trade with them both ways, and the bill provides for that in 1909. That, however, is not feasible at this time. In the first place, goods going from the United States into the Philippine Islands pay the same rate of duty as like goods from other countries, and this practice must continue until 1909, for the reason that under the treaty of Paris Spain is entitled to the same advantages in tariff duties on exports to the Philippine Islands that the United States enjoy for a period of ten years. In the second place the revenue to be derived from the duties now imposed on sugar and tobacco is necessary for the maintenance of the Philippine government. The revenue to be collected under the bill does not go into the Treasury of the United States but into the Philippine treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DALZELL. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that I may be allowed to proceed without interruption, and then I shall be very glad at the end to answer any questions which any gentleman may ask.

Whether the acquisition of the Philippine Islands by the United States was in the first place desirable is now a question of no possible moment. It is purely academic. By the treaty of Paris the islands became subject to our sovereignty and as much a part of our territory as Alaska, Porto Rico, or New Mexico. Nor is the question as to their ultimate fate a live question. It is admitted on all hands that no man can foresee the time when the Philippine people will be able to take care of themselves. In the meantime they must remain our wards.

The question is not as to what some future generation of our descendants shall in their day do with the Philippine Islands and their people. The question is, What shall we do with them? What shall we do with them now? The possible relation of the United States to the Philippine Islands a century hence rests in the realm of impossible conjecture. It is vain for us to deal in imaginings. We must take for granted that those who come after us will be faithful to their duty as up to this time we have been loyal to ours, and as I trust we shall remain loyal by the enactment of this just law in the interests of a suffering people who in the providence of God have been intrusted to and remain under our care. [Applause.]

Mr. McKinley said:

> The Philippines are ours, not to exploit, but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to a mighty trust committed to us.

And we have been following in that path of duty. We have committed ourselves to the policy which makes these islands and their people a part of us. We have put down insurrection and granted amnesty. Our flag floats triumphant in the skies of the Orient. We have established civil government of the most enlightened character. There is no right or liberty known to ourselves, heirs of all the ages, except the right of trial by jury and to bear arms, that we have not given to them, and these rights have been withheld in their interest. The instructions of President McKinley to the Philippine Commission, which constitute the Philippine scheme of government, have evoked the highest praise from the lovers of liberty all the world over. That great state paper has been said to be—> a constitution, a code judicial, a system of laws ready made, statutes administrative covering all the activities of a nation and meeting wants and solving problems innumerable, all rolled into one. It was a masterly summing up of the governing experience of the self-governing people of the world, adapted to and specially arranged for effective work in a given field.

Government has been administered pursuant to the President's instructions in all the islands, in their provinces and cities. Courts have been established; civil service inaugurated; rivers and harbors improved; light-houses established; the gold standard adopted; telegraphs built; roads and bridges projected, and, over and above all, schools provided; in a word, such an American policy adopted as commits us to its continuance to a successful issue. To abandon it now would not only be to prove ourselves recreant to a mighty trust, but would mean disaster and anarchy and bloodshed to the Filipinos. [Applause.]

Furthermore, by our legislation we have emphatically declared that they are part and parcel of us. We have extended to them our navigation laws. We have extended to them our immigration laws. We have extended to them our alien contract-labor laws. Do you mean to tell me that we shall confine them to our domestic policy, shall compel the carriage of their goods in American bottoms and at the same time refuse them the enjoyment of our markets? Surely, surely not. The Philippine Islands can not be at the same time both foreign and domestic. [Applause.] They must be either wholly foreign or wholly domestic. By the decision of our highest court, by the inauguration of a governmental policy more than once indorsed by the people of this country, and by our legislation, explicit in terms, we have declared the Philippine Islands to be wholly domestic. Under these circumstances a tariff can no more be justified on general principles between the Philippine Islands and the United States than between the United States and Porto Rico and between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands.

The gentleman from Colorado did me the honor yesterday to quote from a speech which I made upon the floor of this House during the Porto Rican controversy, and he did it for the purpose, he said, of showing that I had abandoned some doctrines to which I then adhered. I want to say to the gentleman from Colorado that the charge of inconsistency, which Emerson has characterized as the terror of feeble minds, has no terror for me. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no man who will continue for any length of time in public life who will not at some time or other be charged with apparent inconsistency, but in this particular case I am guilty of no inconsistency. The great absorbing question that was agitating the American people when that speech was made was, Does the Constitution follow the flag? In the government of our insular possessions are we bound by the limitations of the Constitution? I strenuously maintained that we were not. The Supreme Court of the United States subsequently decided that we were not. To that doctrine I still adhere. In pointing out the consequences that would follow in case we were bound by the limitations of the Constitution, I said that we would be compelled to give free trade to Porto Rico and to the Philippines. We would be compelled to incorporate into the body of our citizenship 12,000,000 Malays and extend to them our navigation laws. I protested against the putting of our labor upon a plane with the half-savage labor of the Philippines. I still contend that if bound by the limitations of the Constitution all that I said then would be true, and I propose to demonstrate now that the enactment of this measure will not place the labor of the Philippines upon a plane with our farmers nor affect a single dollar of a single American wage-earner's wage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, what are the conditions that exist now as compared with the conditions that existed then? Now we have free trade with Porto Rico. We have extended to her the protection of the Dingley law. We have given her a Territorial form of government and admitted her to representation upon the floor of this House. Nay, more, we have a limited tariff law with the Philippine Islands. We have extended to them, as I have said, our navigation laws, our immigration laws, and our contract-labor laws.

We have given them a Territorial form of government. In a word, we have treated them, in so far as their condition would admit of it, precisely as we treat ourselves. Why? The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] said that I said in that speech, after recounting these things, that I called a halt. I did call a halt, but the people of the United States refused to respond. They said, "A pest upon your constitutional technicalities; the Constitution may not follow the flag, but justice and fair play do." [Applause on the Republican side.] They said, "Porto Rico is ours, she bears allegiance to our flag, and she shall be treated as our own." And then the press of this country rose in its might, without distinction of party, creed, or section, from ocean to ocean, from the Lakes to the Gulf, and with a persistence and with a bitterness unprecedented in all our political history, denounced us as violators of our plain duty. And yet our duty to Porto Rico then was no plainer than is our duty to the Philippines now. [Applause on the Republican side.] Then, as Representatives of the American people, as the recorders of their will, from that day to this, piece by piece we have enacted such legislation as they said it was our plain duty to enact. So much for that. So much for the charge against me of inconsistency.

What now is the necessity for this measure? It is twofold—to encourage the industries of the Philippine Islands and to furnish them with revenue. The policy that we have inaugurated in the Philippine Islands for their benefit is an expensive policy. It involves internal improvements of all kinds, but, as I said before, over and above all else it involves the establishment of schools. If we are to raise these people, if we are to make of them possible American citizens or even citizens of an independent Philippine Archipelago, they must be educated. There are now in our schools there 500,000 children, and there are in the islands 2,000,000 children of school age that ought to be provided for, and, my fellow Representatives, that must be provided for. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The greatest industry in the Philippine Islands is the raising of hemp. Of that they have a monopoly. Until recently one of their sources of revenue was an export duty thereon. That duty Congress, in the interest of our farmers, laborers, and cordage manufacturers, has recently removed, and to that extent crippled the Philippine treasury. It is believed that the revenue to be raised by this act will go far toward supplying that loss and that at the expiration of three years the internal-revenue system of the islands will be sufficiently perfected and adjusted to render the further collection of duties on sugar and tobacco unnecessary.

Now, in addition to what we have taken away from the Philippines they have had other troubles. They have been swept as to some of their industries, as it were, by the besom of destruction. This is especially true of the sugar industry. Let me read to you from the Philippine census:

> Progress in the development of the sugar industry reached its highest development in 1893. A decline set in from the year following, which continued until 1895, when there was a favorable reaction lasting two seasons. In 1897 the depression set in from which it has been unable to recover up to the present day. This depression is due to the vicissitudes agriculture has experienced in this country during the past few years, caused, first, by the competition of the beet sugar in the great centers of consumption; second, by the growth of hemp and cocoanut plantations, which have taken away a considerable number of laborers from sugar estates; third, by the continual fluctuations in the price of sugar, brought about by the financial crisis and the rate of exchange that resulted in the failure of many planters; and last, by the war, the rinderpest, cholera, the miasmatic fevers, famine, and the locusts, which brought ruin to many plantations and caused a complete depression in the cultivation of the cane in nearly all of the sugar-providing provinces.

Let me read to you further from the testimony of Mr. De la Rama, a sugar planter and a merchant in Iloilo. He says:

> Our situation at the present time is a very deplorable one. Seven years of calamities, with war and plagues, failures of crops, etc., have reduced us to a state of misery to such an extent that in many plantations of Negros and Panay the cultivation of sugar has been entirely abandoned. Owing to the low price secured by the farmer for his products during the past few years, a great many planters have been unable to meet their obligations and to-day are on the eve of losing their property. This situation has brought on the farmers the further misfortune of entirely losing their credit. They are unable to get credit any longer. It is impossible for us to hope to reestablish our credit with bankers and money lenders throughout the islands unless these gentlemen become convinced that the future of this industry in these islands is such as to secure to them the repayment of their loans. At present the situation is a very deplorable one. There are planters both in the island of Panay and in that of Negros, who, having the deeds of their property in their hands, apply to the money lenders and to the bankers for a loan, offering to secure the loan by mortgaging their entire property, and are unable to secure even sufficient money to attend to their most pressing personal wants.

That is the situation of your ward in the Philippine Archipelago. The practical question is, What are you going to do about it? Our answer is, Enact into law the pending bill, and in a measure, at least, restore to these people their credit and the means to continue their industry.

But just here we are met by the opposition of two American industries. The advocates of the sugar industry, especially the beet-sugar industry, and of the tobacco industry say the enactment of this measure will ruin both of their industries in the United States. Is their contention well taken——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will it be fair to ask what tobacco men are complaining?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, not the tobacco men from the section of the country in which the gentleman is interested, and, in fact, very few of them anywhere.

Is their contention well taken? I say most emphatically, no; and I say so after a careful, laborious, and impartial examination of the questions involved; and hardly an impartial examination either, because, as a protectionist, I approached the subject in the first instance with a decided leaning against the proposed legislation. A large amount of testimony was taken by the Committee on Ways and Means of persons representing all sides of the controversy. I agree with my friend from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] that many things might be proved from that testimony, but as every lawyer in the habit of weighing evidence knows, the competency of the witnesses, their means of knowledge, their natural bias, must all be taken into consideration in arriving at the truth. And I want to say that it was very apparent that the testimony of Government officers in the Philippines was very often given without opportunity for personal knowledge, oftentimes prematurely, and generally colored by a desire to make things in the islands appear to as great an advantage as possible.

I propose to examine the case first with respect to the interest of the sugar industry. It was conceded that under present conditions Philippine competition amounted to nothing. It is not the past or the present, but the future only that is feared. The Unied States is compelled to import each year in the neighborhood of 2,000,000 tons of sugar. The greatest quantity ever produced for export in the Philippines was 256,000 tons, and that in the year 1893. The exports for the years since the war are as follows; I speak in round numbers:

In 1899, 84,000 and odd tons, of which 21,000 came to the United States; 1900, 64,000 and odd tons, of which 2,000 and odd came to the United States. In 1901, 55,000—say 56,000 tons—of which 5,000 came to the United States; 1902, 97,000 tons, of which 5,000 came to the United States; 1903, 83,000 tons, of which 28,000 came to the United States, and 1904, 82,000, of which 25,000 came to the United States.

Now, it is perfectly plain that if the whole amount of the largest production of sugar in the Philippine Islands under such circumstances as I have indicated should come into the United States, it would not be a drop in the bucket compared with our production and our immense importations. Heretofore no sugar, as I have shown to you, of any consequence has come to the United States from the Philippine Islands, and the largest shipments were sent here on speculation. They are still in bond in New York, not taken out, because of the hope that they would get out under lower duties; and the bill before the House provides that that sugar, when removed for consumption, shall pay the same duties that the law prescribed when it came in.

I have shown you the present and the past. As to the future, I think that I can show that the fears of the advocates of our sugar industry are baseless, and that their position is founded on a misapprehension of the actual conditions. Let me illustrate. The most prominent and the most zealous advocate of beet sugar that appeared before the committee was Mr. Hathaway. He says:

> It is not for the present but for the future that we plead, and when the Philippine Commission specifies plainly and clearly that there are 50,000,000 acres of land in the Philippine Islands that are well adapted to sugar and tobacco, and when, in addition to that, they go forward still further and advocate that 25,000,000 acres of these lands be not sold, but given to capitalists who will go into these islands and develop the sugar plantations on those islands, and when the same Commission report specifies that each one of those acres can produce 5 tons of sugar, I reaffirm, gentlemen, that it is not the present but the future that we are looking to.

Well, my friends, there are a great many things in the reports of the Philippine Commission that experience has shown not to be true. In the first place, there is no evidence that any acre of land in the Philippines is capable of producing 5 tons of sugar, and to say that there is is the purest speculation. And in the next place, I should insult your intelligence did I stop to argue to you that no Congress of the United States will ever give away for any purpose 25,000,000 acres of land. But even if it were so foolish and regardless of the rights of its constituents, the gift would be useless in the absence of labor, of which it is not denied that there is such a scarcity in the islands that there is barely sufficient to work the estates now in cultivation.

There are no 50,000,000 acres of land in the islands capable of raising sugar. The total area is estimated at 73,00,000 acres. To secure such cultivation as there is it has taken those people hundreds of years. There are 180,000 acres in sugar, 1,600,000 in rice, 80,000 in tobacco, 60,000 in sweet potatoes, 85,000 in plantains, 550,000 in hemp, 375,000 in cocoanuts, 267,000 in corn, an area not calculated in small farms raising the food of the people, and 50,000,000 acres of mountain and impenetrable jungle and forest, a large proportion inhabited by roaming savages.

Now, assuming the impossible, assuming that the forest lands would raise sugar—and no one knows whether they will or not—under laws that we have enacted, not an acre of them can be sold or leased until under licenses regularly issued, they shall be stripped of their timber, and that will not be in your day or mine or in that of your children or mine or your grandchildren or mine. What pure speculation and moonshine this is, furnished to you as the basis of sound legislation. Listen to the argument: Fifty million acres, 5 tons to the acre, 250,000,000 tons of sugar shortly to be ready for the market.

Why our sugar people have been continually appealing to us for time. "We have the beet lands," they say, "the machinery within reach, but it takes time to induce capital to invest, time to educate the laborer, time to develop the beet, time to improve the machinery; our industry must grow gradually with the increase of population and the improvement in methods," and yet in the same breath they have tumbled into the world's markets sugar from the forests of the Philippines to feed the world, as it were, by a divine nod.

Let me put the argument from the Philippine standpoint. There is enough land in Louisiana capable of raising sugar, not under cultivation for sugar, to supply the world with that product. Louisiana has multiplied her production by two in fifty years. The same may be said of the capacity of Cuba. Cuba has multiplied her production by three in twenty-five years. If the Philippines should do as well as Louisiana, they will have reached a production of something over 500,000 tons in fifty years from now. If the Philippines should do as well as Cuba, they will have reached a production of less than 900,000 tons in twenty-five years, and that is 300,000 tons less than we import from Cuba to-day. The world's consumption has multiplied by three in twenty-five years, and our consumption is increasing at the rate of 7 per cent per annum. The inconsequence of the argument of the opponents of this bill might be pursued ad nauseam.

Texas has sugar lands sufficient in area to supply all the sugar that the world consumes. Why does she not do it? We are assured by the Secretary of Agriculture and by the beet-sugar advocates that the United States has beet-sugar lands that if cultivated will supply home consumption and furnish a surplus for export.

The truth is that the area of sugar land in the Philippines is a matter of not the least consequence in the absence of capital and labor. During the six years of our occupancy has any American capital entered the Philippines to invest in sugar lands? Not a dollar. Mr. Hathaway says he was sent to the islands to ascertain whether he and those who sent him should invest in sugar lands. He claims to have made a thorough investigation, and on his return reported against any investment. He said furthermore that as a matter of choice he would rather invest, if at all, without this legislation than after its enactment. The sugar lands of Louisiana and Texas and the great West and Northwest lie at our own doors, in a land where capital is abundant and courageous, labor reasonably accessible and intelligent, where enterprise abounds, where there are railroads and churches and schoolhouses in the midst of an American civilization, surrounded by American homes. The Philippine archipelago is 8,000 miles across seas, where there is no capital, a scarcity of labor, unintelligent at that, where the people are many of them only half civilized, where there are no railroads, nor markets, where diseases are rampant, destroying both man and beast, and where prevail the medieval customs and the depressing civilization of hundreds of years of Spanish rule. I pray you, discreet American investor, answer me, in which place will you invest your money?

If I were to give him advice I would say to him, Go not to the Philippine Islands, where thou shalt be afraid for the terror by night and for the arrow that flieth by day; for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and for the destruction that wasteth at noonday; but come with me. "I will take you on a journey to fair Colorado, where the sun shines the brightest, the sky is the clearest, the air is the purest, where all life is a continual joy from the rise of the early morning sun until it sinks below the snow-capped peaks of an eternal mountain range, the very treasure house of the nation's wealth." [Laughter and applause.]

Come with me and I will show you in Colorado beet-sugar lands as illimitable as the imagination of the opponents of this measure. [Laughter.] There you shall invest your capital, and you shall have your office in "the proud city of Denver, in the midst of its costly public edifices, its stately structures of mart and commerce, and you shall live in one of its palatial homes." [Great laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, even if capital could be secured, it would avail nothing without labor. It is conceded upon all hands—no man denies it—that labor is scarce in the Philippines—hardly sufficient for present needs. Governor Wright, testifying before the Senate committee, said:

> The sugar industry, in my opinion, can not be very largely developed in the Philippine Islands. Of course it can be increased considerably, but it can not be made a rival to other countries which produce sugar on a large scale so long as the present policy of the United States is continued as to the exclusion of the Chinese labor from that country. In other words, the native Filipino laborer is largely engaged in raising rice and food products, aside from sugar, and in gathering hemp and copra, and there is not a very great amount of labor there available for sugar raising on a large and profitable scale.

Senator BURROWS said:

> Then do I understand that owing to labor conditions the development of the sugar industry would be retarded?

Governor Wright responded:

> It would be slow.
> Senator BURROWS. And it would be necessary to admit cheap labor—Chinese labor—in order to make it profitable?
> Governor WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

And this introduces us to another bugaboo of the opponents of this bill. They are afraid of Chinese cooly labor. Well, gentlemen, there is no Chinese cooly labor in the sugar fields now. Whether there shall be or not is a matter that depends on you. You have extended the Chinese-exclusion law to the Philippines. You have been asked by the Philippine Commission to suspend its operation for a term of years, under safeguards that would insure the export of the Chinaman at the end of the term. You refused to do it. Are you going to repeal that law? Do you believe that any party, Republican or Democratic, when in power will repeal it? If not, it would seem as though the limit of sugar production in the Philippines had almost if not entirely been reached.

I do not propose to spend much time in the discussion of the question as to how cheaply sugar may be produced in the Philippines. It seems to me that its only importance in this discussion is in its relation to the matter of inducing capital to invest. Up to this time it has had no influence whatever in that direction.

Upon the question of cost there is a vast amount of evidence, as is usual in such cases, contradictory. There is the evidence of the beet-sugar men, which necessarily is nothing but hearsay; there is the evidence of Government officials embodied in Government reports, which is also to some extent hearsay, and is couched, as a rule, in glowing terms as to Philippine possibilities. Much is sought to be made by this kind of evidence, as, for instance, the statement of Governor Taft that "this is another place where the sugar of the world may be raised." But I ask you what sort of a foundation does that furnish on which to base legislation in the absence of facts and figures? I venture the assertion that no candid man with impartial mind can read this record who will not rise up from a study of that testimony and say that a fair deduction is that it costs 1.50 cents a pound to raise sugar in the Philippine Islands—that is to say, 1.50 cents a pound delivered at Iloilo, the sugar port of the islands.

I have here a statement, furnished by Messrs. Willett & Gray, the sugar experts of this country, who are recognized as authority upon all sides. It is the history of the unfortunate shipments that are now in bond in New York.

Philippine stock in New York, December 19, 1905, 38,048 tons; value when shipped (average), 2.14 cents a pound United States currency, free on board at Iloilo; 2.14 cents a pound bought on speculation when sugar was high; value December 19, 1905, 2.56 cents United States currency, at New York; value free on board at Iloilo, $1,823,640; duty at present rate, say, 75 per cent of 1.265, $808,900. Marine insurance, $50,150; freight, $190,240; storage, $50,000; fire insurance, $9,200; interest six months, at 3 per cent, $60,000; cost December 19, 1905, $2,992,130; value December 19, 1905, $2,181,630; loss on the basis of 75 per cent of the Dingley bill, $810,500; loss on the basis of 25 per cent of the Dingley bill, $273,700.

Now, is there any American capitalist that in view of a statement like that is going to invest his money in the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands? Why, we had a great discussion in the committee as to the cost of these various items, and I have them here, furnished by Willett & Gray, in connection with this statement. Insurance, 0.0588; freight, 0.22; storage, 0.0586; fire insurance, 0.0107; so that the whole amounts to this, 0.3481. Now, beet sugar in Iloilo at 1.50, with 0.34 added in New York, amounts to 1.84; but sugar of the Philippine Islands is worth a cent a pound less than commercial sugar in New York, and that makes 2.84, and it costs a cent—whether it actually costs a cent or not to the parties refining, the seller of the sugar pays the cent for refined sugar, and that makes 3.84. Adding 25 per cent for duty, 33⅓ cents per hundred pounds, and you have 4.17, cost in New York for Philippine sugar, as against 3.90 in Michigan for Michigan sugar and 3.71 in Colorado for Colorado sugar.

But, furthermore, the beet-sugar witnesses before us had no calculation to give to us as to the profits of the by-products, which, of course, if realized upon would reduce the cost. Now, there is molasses, worth according to the testimony, from $2.80 to $3.50 a ton. There is alcohol, which, of course, belongs to the distiller. He may or he may not be a beet-sugar producer. Mr. Humphrey said that they had paid twelve hundred thousand dollars of internal-revenue taxes to the United States upon alcohol. Now, that means, at $1.10 a gallon, 1,100,000 gallons of alcohol, and at 34 cents a gallon, the price testified that was paid for it, it means from $330,000 to $340,000. Then, again, Mr. Hathaway told us there was a machine whereby the dry pulp might be utilized. He told us it sold at $14 a ton; that there was 5 per cent of dried pulp in the beet and 15 per cent of sugar, and the price of pulp, he said, was $14 a ton. A little calculation will show that that means 0.00208 for pulp for each pound of sugar, and for each hundred pounds 0.208. Now, according to Mr. Hathaway, they receive for their sugar 4.15 cents. Add to that the 0.208 and you have 4.358, or a profit at 3.90 for the sugar cost of 0.458 per hundred pounds; or, if we take Mr. Fordney's calculation of 4.50 for sugar and add to that 0.208, you have 4.708, or 0.808 profit per 100 pounds of sugar. Now, he said that they spent $9,780 in getting rid of the pulp. That then they went to work and erected a machine. It cost $67,000. As a result by means of it they saved the $9,780 that they had heretofore spent, and they made 6 per cent on their investment. Now, then, putting all these things together and arriving at the possible actual sugar cost, it will be apparent that the beet-sugar of this country is in no danger of competition with any possible Philippine sugar development within the next century.

But I regard this question as of minor importance, for the reason that the enactment of this measure can not injure the sugar producer, because it will not lower the price that he will receive for his product. That must be conceded. But if it were not, it is easy of proof. We consumed in this country in 1904, 2,700,000 tons, in round numbers, of sugar. We produced, including beet and cane and sugar from Hawaii and Porto Rico, about 990,000 tons, in round numbers. These figures are not exact, but they answer the purpose of my illustration. We had to import, therefore, 1,710,000 tons. Twelve hundred thousand tons of this came from Cuba and paid a duty of 80 per cent of the Dingley rates.

The remainder, 510,000 tons, came from elsewhere and paid the full Dingley rates. Under these circumstances what fixes the price of sugar? Is it not apparent that the sugar imported at the full rate of duty fixed the price? Is it not apparent that it will continue to fix the price so long as it continues to be imported; that when it ceases to be imported the sugar paying the 80 per cent duty will fix the price; that there never will be a price fixed by competition in our home market until home supply equals home demand? And when will that be? That will be when the United States, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, which now produce 990,000 tons and the Philippines which last year produced 84,000 tons, altogether 1,074,000 tons, shall produce the 3,000,000 tons that we consume annually, plus 7 per cent of an increase each year in consumption. Until that time no beet-sugar man or cane-sugar man in this country will receive a single solitary penny less for his sugar. [Applause on Republican side.]

Now, if that be true—and if it be not let some man stand up and challenge the statement—if that be true, answer me how any sugar industry in the United States is in any danger for a half century to come.

Oh, I know it will be answered that it will arrest the spread of the industry. Well, that is precisely what was said by these same gentlemen when they were opposing the Cuban reciprocity measure. And in the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means recently it was said that not a single beet-sugar factory had been erected since the enactment of Cuban reciprocity. Mr. Hathaway, the star witness and the most zealous champion of the opposition, said so, and one of my colleagues from Michigan said that not a single factory had been erected in Michigan and that two had gone out of operation. I very much fear that the zeal of the gentlemen has had the effect of blinding their powers of observation.

I find some information on this point in a publication of the Agricultural Department entitled "Progress of the Beet-Sugar Industry in the United States in 1904." It is Report No. 80, of the Department of Agriculture. Page 97 of that report shows twelve locations where arrangements were complete for the establishment of factories and thirty-two other points where factories will probably be built.

The American Sugar Industry and Beet-Sugar Gazette—to use its own language, "the leading journal devoted to the interests of the American sugar producer"—under date December 5, 1905, shows that of the factories referred to in the pamphlet of the Agricultural Department the following have been built and are in actual operation:

Colorado: Lamar, with a daily slicing capacity of 400 tons of beets; Holly, with a daily capacity of 600 tons of beets; Sterling, with a daily capacity of 600 tons of beets.

Illinois: Riverdale, with a daily capacity of 350 tons of beets.

Michigan: Blissfield, with a daily capacity of 600 tons of beets.

Utah: Lewiston, with a daily capacity of 600 tons of beets.

Wisconsin: Menomonie, with a daily capacity of 500 tons of beets.

These have a total slicing capacity of 3,650 tons of beets daily.

This same journal of the same date shows further that there are now in process of erection for the campaign of 1906 the following:

California: Visalia, capacity 350 tons.

Wisconsin: Madison, capacity 600 tons.

Arizona: Glendale, capacity 800 tons.

Montana: Billings, capacity 1,200 tons.

Idaho: Vampa, capacity 600 tons.

Colorado: Brush, capacity 600 tons; Fort Morgan, capacity 600 tons.

These will have a total slicing capacity of 4,750 tons daily. So that the factories already built since the enactment of Cuban reciprocity and those in process of erection together have a capacity of 8,400 tons of beets daily.

Mr. FORDNEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that before the enactment of Cuban reciprocity we had 52 factories in operation in the United States and only have 54 now, and that there have been several factories torn down elsewhere that the gentleman does not mention?

Mr. DALZELL. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, it is in connection with this statement.

Mr. DALZELL. I will come to that in a moment—the matter of the tearing down of factories. I am reading to you from an official document, and I think the gentleman will not deny that the daily capacity, by reason of factories already erected and in process of erection since Cuban reciprocity, is eighty-four hundred tons.

Now let me quote Mr. Hathaway. He says that the cost of putting up a sugar plant by any one of the three leading construction companies that put up those plants is $1,000 for each ton of daily capacity; that is, per ton of beets. If you put up a factory that will cut 600 tons of beets a day, it will cost you $600,000. So that it seems, notwithstanding the testimony before the committee, that since Cuban reciprocity there has gone into the beet-sugar industry in this country $8,400,000 of good American capital. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now just a word as to my friend's reference to the shutting down of factories in Michigan because of Cuban reciprocity. I come back again to this same little book, The Progress of the Beet-Sugar Industry in the United States, and I find the following:

In Michigan—

This is the official report of the Agricultural Department—

we find the most unfortunate records chargeable to the beet-sugar industry since its inception. These were the result of natural and economic causes. There was too much rush and not enough careful study of economic conditions in establishing the factories. Factory building was pushed beyond its resources. Too many plants were located in too small an area. Few of them received enough beets on that account. If sufficient time had elapsed, Michigan could have sustained all the factories she had built. As it was, some of them led a precarious existence. Two of them had been removed from the State, the one at Benton Harbor to Canada and the one at Kalamazoo to Chippewa Falls, Wis.

Then, after the explanation that the business had been entered upon too hastily, and when they could not secure beets, the report goes on to say:

The results of all this haste and enthusiasm was confusion, jealousy, and strife. Neither factory men nor farmers had had sufficient experience to guide them through the difficulties. The results were that two factories stopped building when nearly completed, two others have removed, and two or three more will probably do so.

I submit to you that I have proven that Cuban reciprocity has not interfered with the beet-sugar industry in this country and the investment of capital therein, but that every failure that has been referred to in the beet-sugar industry has been due to natural and economic causes.

Well, now, my friends, I am not here to contend that this bill will not increase sugar production in the Philippine Islands, because if it will not it is useless; but my contention is that the ultimate production will be limited and the growth will be slow.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my friend permit a question at this point?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was there any testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means to show that sugar had ever been made profitably in the Philippine Islands except upon the island of Negros?

Mr. DALZELL. Not a word.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was there not testimony to show that as much perhaps as 50 per cent of the labor necessary to harvest that crop was imported from other islands?

Mr. DALZELL. It came from the island of Panay.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At least 50 per cent?

Mr. DALZELL. At least 50 per cent.

Now, I say that my contention is that the ultimate production will be small, comparatively, and the growth of the industry will be slow; and I want to quote here the testimony given by Mr. De la Rama, because I find that it is corroborated by the highest authority upon the beet-sugar industry in the United States. Mr. De la Rama says:

Even if we were to introduce modern methods of manufacture, by bringing in modern machinery, it would, in my opinion, take at least five years before we could get the plants properly established in these islands. I believe, furthermore, that it would take fifteen years longer to be able to get all conditions so favorable as to make a crop in the Philippine Islands which would aggregate 300,000 tons; so that, counting in the five years taken to construct modern machinery and the fifteen years that the industry would need to develop to the point of producing 300,000 tons, and we have twenty years as the period which would be required to reach that figure. It is estimated that the cost of machinery capable of producing 300,000 tons of sugar would be $20,000,000 gold. This, of course, must be considered as a mere estimate; but I consider that sum to be the cost of machinery necessary to produce 300,000 tons. If we take that as a basis in the length of time required before we could reach that production which I have above cited, the markets of the United States in the meantime would have a shortage of double what it now is, or 4,000,000 tons, and against that the 300,000 tons produced in the Philippine Islands would be of no consequence whatever.

So much for Mr. De la Rama, a sugar planter in the Philippine Islands.

Now, let me call your attention to the testimony of Mr. Oxnard, the president of the American Beet Sugar Association, the pioneer in that industry in this country and its most potential representative. Here is what he says:

Perhaps it may be well to draw attention to one or two features of the industry:

1. Its product is a staple of universal consumption and of the readiest sale.

2. The product is a finished article, the sugar being turned out refined and granulated, the manufacturer not being dependent upon the refiners' trust for his market.

3. Competition by home production is so remote as to be scarcely worth consideration. The United States is now compelled to import three-quarters of its consumption, and it would take at least 300 factories of a daily capacity of 500 tons of beets to produce present importation.

Regarding the future development and permanency of the beet-sugar industry in the United States, there can be absolutely no doubt for the following reasons:

Of the tropical countries which it is proposed to annex to the United States, Porto Rico is too small to cut any figure, and the Philippine Islands have not the necessary elements for the expansion of the sugar business sufficiently rapid to give any concern to those interested in the production of sugar from beets in this country for the next twenty-five years to come.

[Applause.]

And yet you are going to pour right into the markets of the world 250,000,000 tons of sugar, at the rate of 5 tons to the acre, from 50,000,000 acres of wild land in the Philippines!

The views thus expressed by Señor de la Rama and by Mr. Oxnard are in accordance with common sense; they are certainly in accordance with all human experience. Under the most favorable circumstances the growth of the sugar industry has been gradual and slow in our own country, in Cuba, in Hawaii, in Porto Rico. Its growth in Europe depended upon government bounties. What is to be expected of it under the unfavorable circumstances existing in the Philippine Islands, where methods are of the crudest, where machinery is lacking, where work animals are wanting, but especially where those absolute essentials to growth are wanting—capital and labor? In a word, the increased production in the Philippine Islands depends upon capital, intelligent labor, modern methods of cultivation, machinery, railroads, ordinary roads, boats, warehouses—all the accessories of modern industrialism and commerce—and the Philippine Islands have none of them.

In striking contrast with the outlook for the sugar industry in the Philippines is the outlook of that industry in the United States. As I have shown, capital is from time to time seeking investment therein, labor is learning more and more to adapt itself to sugar-beet culture, and year by year the cost of manufacture is being reduced. All experience teaches us the value of American genius by way of the invention of new processes. One of the beet-sugar advocates who appeared before our committee called attention to a machine which largely reduces the cost and multiplies the efficiency of labor in the beet field. By means of this machine beets are picked, topped, and thrown in orderly rows ready to be carried away.

But what I want particularly to call your attention to in this connection is a circular issued by Mr. Palmer, the secretary of the American Beet Sugar Association of the United States, and necessarily a high authority—a circular issued, mind you, not to obtain subscriptions to stock, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asserted, but issued to his fellow-owners of beet-sugar factories in the United States, calling upon them to come down here and compel Congress to defeat this measure. Here is what he says:

I take it—

And this is significant—

I take it that further Philippine tariff reduction is likely to come in due course of time, but it should not come until the Philippines greatly raise their wage rate on sugar haciendas and become at least semi-civilized, and until the brains and capital already engaged in the home industry, and which will come to it under favorable circumstances if let alone, enable us to perfect the various improvements now under way.

Two years ago I wrote you at length concerning my suggestions of producing single-germ beet seed. The work was begun immediately by the Government and the first crop of seed from beets grown from 2,500 selected single-germ beet balls has just been harvested. I understand that 30 per cent of this seed came single germ and the expectation is that in four to six years more it will be an established thing, saving the farmers $6 per acre of actual labor, eliminating the hand work of thinning on hands and knees, and at least doubling the tonnage per acre on account of no injury being done to the remaining beets by hoeing out the superfluous ones, each plant standing 1 to 3 inches apart, depending upon how closely the seed is drilled in. If the sugar beets which the farmer now sells to the factory at an average price of $5 per ton cost him $3.50 per ton to produce, his crop grown from single-germ beet balls should not cost him to exceed $1.50 a ton.

The Government has taken charge of the scientific work on one of our beet-sugar seed farms in the State of Washington, and expects to be able to produce a strain of seed as high in sugar content as the best beets selected at the outset, which is 25 to 28 per cent. These mother beets should give factory beets of 23 per cent sugar, and, with a loss in extraction of 3 per cent, would enable the factory to turn out 400 pounds of granulated sugar per ton of beets. According to the Government report on the home-sugar industry for 1902, the average amount of sugar extracted per ton of beets was 221 pounds; hence this anticipated extra production of 170 pounds would nearly cut in two the present factory cost of producing sugar from American-grown beets.

Doctor Wiley, chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, is to experiment this coming month with sugar "concrete," and, if successful, each factory, by increasing its investment 25 per cent, can operate three near-by "concrete" plants, shipping in the "concrete" to the main factory after the local campaign has been concluded and thus operating the year through and quadrupling its product, which would greatly lessen the cost of production.

Experiments are being made this year with an invention designed to remove the impurities of the juice at the outset instead of from the waste molasses after coming down through all the various processes, the inventor claiming that it will reduce the cost of a beet-sugar plant by 50 per cent, the labor to operate it by 33⅓ per cent, yield an average excess of 20 pounds of sugar per ton of beets, besides saving several valuable by-products.

All these matters lead to an eventual cost of production of granulated sugar from American-grown beets of something like 2 cents per pound, but it takes not only money and brains to perfect these improvements, but it takes time.

It takes time everywhere except in the Philippine Archipelago.

We can offer the Philippine Islands a perpetual market for nearly $200,000,000 worth of purely tropical products annually. But whatever magnitude their sugar industry may reach, those who put their money into it will some day be compelled to fight a battle royal with the educated scientific American farmer which will be costly for both and ruinous for one—

Now, mark it—

Never in the history of the world has the nervous energy of the Temperate Zone succumbed to the listless workers of the Tropics, and it remains to be seen whether or not the sugar industry is to furnish the exception.

Does Mr. Palmer believe that he has a monopoly of the knowledge that capital can not be invested in the Philippine Islands with any reasonable hope of profit? Does he suppose that the American capitalist does not know that the nervous energy of the Temperate Zone will win always in a fight with the listless worker of the Tropics?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown that the opposition to this bill, so far as sugar is concerned, is built upon senseless fears and a misapprehension of existing conditions.

Now just a single word about tobacco. I have not given to that the study that I have to the other question, but it seems to me that if I were not to be accused of being discourteous I would be inclined to say that the claims of the tobacco men in connection with this bill are simply ridiculous. They say they have no fears for the present; that what they fear for is the future, just as in the other case, and they fear an indefinite expansion of the tobacco trade in the Philippine Islands. They assert that there are 50,000,000 acres in the Philippine Islands adapted to the culture of tobacco—the same 50,000,000 acres, my friends, that we have already planted in sugar. The illimitable expanse of tobacco territory and the illimitable expanse of sugar territory in the Philippine Islands are one and the same thing, and neither one of them has any existence in fact.

Mr. CASSEL. May I ask the gentleman a question? I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. DALZELL. But the gentleman is interrupting.

Mr. CASSEL. The gentleman is speaking of the large area of tobacco lands in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Bijur testified that the tobacco lands of the Philippine Islands were without limit.

Mr. CASSEL. But in my speech of yesterday I did not say that.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no; the gentleman has too much common sense.

Mr. CASSEL. I said 150,000 acres we were afraid of—less than 1 per cent of all the land in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. DALZELL. I know how my colleague is going to vote, and I think I know what he believes. [Laughter.] Now, the average production of tobacco in the Philippine Islands is 20,000,000 pounds, 2,000,000 pounds less than are produced in the district from which my colleague, who has just interrupted me, comes. Wrapper tobacco they have a very small proportion of in the Philippine Islands—not sufficient to supply the home market. The export leaf last year was 10,000,000 pounds, and not a single pound of it came to the United States, and the price of tobacco in the United States and like tobacco in the Philippine Islands is just about the same.

Of cigars they made 81,000,000, and we made seven and one-half billions. They exported to the United States last year $6,700 worth, and they exported to the world outside $1,000,000 worth. If it had not been for the Louisiana Exposition they would not have exported to this country even $6,700 worth.

Now, I am inclined to believe that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is right when he says:

> The bulk of cigars produced in the islands could not be sold in the American market at any price, and even if the Philippine cigar was admitted duty free into the United States it would not for a long time equal 1 per cent of our domestic trade.

I am inclined to believe with my colleague, Mr. HILL of Connecticut, who thoroughly understands this question and who represents a tobacco district, that it would not equal 1 per cent of the average annual increase in the consumption of cigars in the United States. The average annual increase for the past ten years in the production of cigars in the United States has been 337,753,188, or more than four times the entire export product of the Philippine Islands to all parts of the world last year, and one thousand nine hundred and fifty-five times as much as the entire importation into the United States from the Philippines last year.

> If it were possible—

Mr. HILL said, and I agree with him—

> If it were possible to change the course of their trade from the direction in which it has run since before our nation existed and turn their export product into our market, it would be like pouring a bucket of water into the sea, absolutely without effect.

So that it is manifest that all fear of competition with this great and growing industry in our country by making the tariff changes proposed by this bill is absurd and ridiculous.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I contend, and have argued, first, that we have committed ourselves to such policy in the Philippine Islands as prevents our abandonment of it now without dishonor to ourselves and ruin, anarchy, and bloodshed to the Filipino. Second, that the enactment of this bill into law will afford a measure of relief and inspire hope and confidence, and, third, that it will not injure any American industry.

Mr. Chairman, "the Philippines are ours, not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to a mighty trust committed to us."

Are we ready now to swerve from that path of duty and abandon the development, the civilization, and the education of the Filipinos? Are we ready to be recreant to the great trust committed to us? Are we ready to adopt the policy of scuttle advocated by the Democratic party on this floor, or shall we take up our burden like men and give these people, our wards, this "measure of justice," in the language of President Roosevelt, as an indication of the anxiety of the American people to help the Philippines in some way?

Shall we follow after our standard bearer, who is not only the President of the United States, but the great leader of the great Republican party, or shall we desert him? And if we do, what will our constituents say to us? It will not do to hide self-interest under the plea of loyalty to protection. Protection has no application as between different parts of the United States, and to say that it has is to give the lie to all your history. It will not do to sneer at sentiment. It may answer in this narrow forum, but it will not avail in that greater forum of the American people, a people that sprang to arms to avenge the sailors of the sunken Maine and spilt the blood of its sons in a war, not for glory or conquest, but for humanity and to make of Spain's downtrodden and oppressed colony a free republic. [Applause.]

The same inspiring sentiment calls to-day. Let us respond to it; nay, more, let us hearken to and heed the high resolve of him who being dead yet speaketh, "we will fulfill in the Philippines the obligations imposed by the triumphs of our Army and the treaty of peace, by international law, by the nation's sense of honor, and more than all by the rights, interests, and conditions of the Philippine people themselves." [Great applause.]

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I regret exceedingly that we all can not agree with the conclusion of the able and eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], when he asserted to the House in his peroration that the adoption of this bill would not militate against any American interest.

Mr. Chairman, a great agricultural interest of this country is menaced should the bill under consideration become a law. I say menaced; it would be nearer the mark to say that the rice industry in the United States can be actually destroyed if the policy finding expression in the proposed legislation is adopted by this House.

Less than fifteen years ago there was practically no rice produced in this country. That which was produced was dependent entirely for its growth upon the rainfall, and those engaged in its production were called "Providence rice farmers."

To-day, in the States of Louisiana and Texas alone, it is no exaggeration to state that at least $30,000,000 is invested in the rice industry. Vast systems of irrigating canals have been constructed, some of them more than 20 miles in length. Great pumping plants have been installed to supply them with water necessary for the cultivation and growth of this plant. Rice culture has become one of the recognized important branches of agriculture in America, the direct result and effect of which has been to develop the country and to bring into cultivation hundreds of thousands of acres of land previously considered only available for pasturage.

The Supplement to the Crop Reporter, published by the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, in its issue of December, 1905, gives the following figures with reference to rice produced in the different sections of the United States, which I have reduced to pounds instead of bushels, as that is the way in which rice is handled upon the market:

State.	Acreage.	Production (pounds).
Louisiana	237,900	276,201,900
Texas	194,386	271,168,470
South Carolina	15,477	18,108,090
North Carolina	876	1,024,920
Florida	2,780	3,502,800
Alabama	1,526	2,060,100
Mississippi	1,143	1,234,440
Georgia	5,690	8,193,600
Arkansas	420	510,300
Total	460,198	582,004,620

Of this output we sold in the fiscal year 1905, to Porto Rico, 80,838,816 pounds for $2,508,724, and to Cuba, 34,976,414 pounds for $993,819.

These rices were of the cheaper grade, and were what is known in a commercial sense as broken rice.

Not one pound was shipped from the United States to the Philippine Islands.

In 1890 there was not a rice mill west of the Mississippi River. To-day there are 67, costing on an average $90,000 each, and aggregating an investment of $6,000,000.

According to the report just read from, there were 460,198 acres of land cultivated in rice during the season 1905—432,286 acres of which are in the States of Louisiana and Texas.[a] This land is worth, on an average, $30 an acre, or $13,805,940.

There are 80 canal plants, representing an investment of $8,000,000. The tools, teams, and implements necessary to carry on the rice-growing industry in Louisiana and Texas cost not less than $10 an acre, or more than $4,300,000.

These immense values, newly created by the energy and thrift of American citizens, contribute their quota of taxation in the various localities in which they are situated, thus assisting to maintain the school systems of our sections, the construction of roads and bridges, and in the general internal development of the country.

The lands adapted to rice culture can not be used for anything else, except possibly pasturage on a limited scale. In the event of the present uses to which they are put ceasing to be remunerative they will revert to their original state of worthlessness.

It costs to produce rice and prepare the same for market about 3 cents per pound in all States of the Union except Louisiana and Texas, where the average cost is 2½ cents per pound. The average wholesale price of clean rice is 3½ cents a pound.

Accepting the figures of the Department, to which I have referred above, we produced in the last calendar year about $13,000,000 worth of rice.

The bill under discussion contemplates and provides for absolute free trade in all products the growth of the Philippines with the exception of sugar and tobacco, upon which the tariff is reduced 25 per cent of the Dingley rates until the 11th of April, 1909, after which date all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States are to be admitted free of duty.

The Philippine tariff bill approved on March 3, 1905, imposes a tariff duty from May 1, 1905, until January 1, 1907, of 60 cents per 100 kilos on unhusked rice, 75 cents per 100 kilos on husked rice, and $1.75 per 100 kilos on rice flour. After January 1, 1907, this duty is increased to 80 cents, $1, and $2, respectively, per 100 kilos.

Therefore the present rate of duty on rice imported into the Philippine Islands is 27 cents per 100 pounds on the unhusked and 34 cents per 100 pounds on the husked article.

The production and consumption of rice in the United States are about equal under normal conditions.

The production of rice in the Philippine Archipelago is much less than the consumption.

Statistics furnished by the Bureau of Insular Affairs show that 644,320,463 pounds of rice were produced for the fiscal year 1904 and 808,177,731 pounds in the fiscal year 1905.[b] The Bureau further states that the quantity of rice consumed in the islands in 1902 was 1,371,460,077 pounds, and that it is assumed that the consumption has been about the same each year since that time. From these figures it appears that the Philippine Islands consumed 563,282,346 pounds more than they produced.

The prevailing price for rice in the islands for the fiscal year 1905 was from 1.8 cents to 2 cents per pound. Consequently the Philippine Islands purchased last year $7,456,738 worth of rice, which paid a duty into the treasury of the islands of $1,311,496, likewise transportation charges, and was sold on the market at a profit for 1.9 cents per pound.

I insert here a statement from the Bureau of Insular Affairs showing the quantity in pounds and the duty paid on rice imported for the fiscal year 1905:

Importations of rice into the Philippine Islands during the fiscal year 1905.[c]

[b] Letter from the Bureau of Insular Affairs of December 30, 1905.
[c] Statement furnished by Bureau of Insular Affairs on Jan. 6, 1906.

These figures show that the rice imported into the Philippine Islands was valued at 1.3 cents per pound. This included transportation charges and the duty. It was subsequently sold upon the market on the basis of 1.9 cents per pound, according to information furnished from the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

It follows that the market price of rice produced in the Philippine Islands likewise did not exceed 2 cents per pound.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what do these conditions disclose? They demonstrate the fact that the Philippine Islands can buy all of the rice required for their use at 2 cents per pound, including transportation and existing duty, which they import from Saigoon, in French Siam, and Rangoon, in British Burma, both of which countries are near the Philippine Islands.

Under the provisions of the present bill they could ship into the United States, at a cost of 0.4 of a cent per pound for transportation, their entire production of more than 808,000,000 pounds, and realize therefor not less than 3½ cents per pound, which would give the Filipino rice grower a margin of at least 1 cent per pound, equal to more than $8,080,000.

It is urged, however, by the advocates of this measure, that, as rice has to be imported into the Philippine Islands, it is idle to fear that they will ship their own product and buy elsewhere.

This does not follow by any means. A reference to the rice trade of Japan discloses the fact that that nation is the largest importer of rice in the world, notwithstanding the fact that it is also an exporter. In other words, the people of Japan buy from the East Indies the cheaper grades of rice and export their better quality.

I was unable to obtain the figures for 1904 and 1905, but those from 1901 to 1903, inclusive, show an exportation of more than $2,000,000 worth of rice annually and an importation, under normal conditions, of $6,500,000 per annum, and for the year 1903 of more than $25,000,000.

I will read here a statement of Japan's exports and imports of rice:

Exports of rice from and imports into Japan, 1901–3.

[Compiled from the Twentieth Statistical Report of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, Japan, 1905.]

Calendar year.	Exports.		Imports.
	Quantity.	Value.	Quantity.	Value.
	Bushels.		Bushels.
1901	2,583,770	$3,440,639	6,177,694	$5,915,721
1902	2,519,640	3,326,413	8,951,230	8,839,907
1903	1,632,665	2,470,020	24,144,320	25,876,216

Japan exported to the United States during the fiscal year 1905 12,668,790 pounds of rice, valued at $298,153, and of the inferior grades of rice, such as rice flour, rice meal, and broken rice, it exported to the United States 660,196 pounds, valued at $11,376.[a] The total importations of rice for consumption into the United States for the fiscal year 1905, including all grades, amounted to 102,059,864 pounds, or a value of $1,930,804.51.[b]

The mere statement of these facts is the strongest argument that can be made against the adoption of this measure from a Democratic point of view. The policy of the Democratic party, as I understand it, is to impose a tariff for revenue, and to so adjust it that the necessary revenue shall be raised from revenue-producing articles.

The adoption of this measure will remove duty from rice and reduce it upon sugar and tobacco, all of which are revenue-producing commodities.

In addition, the amendment of the minority stops, after declaring in favor of free trade. If this amendment is adopted we will be in this position, that all articles the product and growth of either country shall have equal rights in their respective ports without the payment of any duty, whereas the duty enforced for the Philippine Archipelago is much lower upon everything which it imports from other countries than the duty on the same imports into the United States.

The duty on uncleaned rice imported into the United States under the Dingley bill is $1.25 per 100 pounds, and the duty on the same grade of rice imported into the Philippines from the East Indies is 34 cents per 100 pounds, or a difference in favor of the Filipino of 91 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. Chairman, I subscribe to the doctrine that taxation must be equal and uniform within the territory levying the tax. I further subscribe to the doctrine that, as representatives of the people, it is our duty to observe the limitations and carry out the provisions of the Constitution, and that the interpretation of that instrument by the Supreme Court of the United States is the law of the land and binding upon us.

[a] Statement furnished by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor, on January 6, 1906.
[b] Table No. 15 of the Annual Report on Commerce and Navigation for 1905.

Consequently, while it is true that the Philippine Islands are territorially a part of the United States, the court declared that Congress had the right to impose on articles coming from that country a tariff or not, as it saw fit, thus deciding the question to be one of governmental policy, with which the courts could not interfere.

No objection then being presented by the mandates of the Constitution, we ought, in the enactment of laws, carry out the principles for which both parties stand—that is, equal rights before the law for every citizen of the United States.

But instead of doing that, this bill grants to the Philippines the right to buy their goods from other countries at rates much lower than we buy from the same countries and then to send their products into the United States with the same liberty that they could be sent from the State of Louisiana to any other State and to enjoy the same protection which it is claimed the people of the United States have under the present law.

Mr. Chairman, believing, as I do, that under the Constitution the Philippines are a part of the territory of the United States, I have no objection to absolute and unrestrained free trade between them and the United States, but I insist that they shall not enter our markets under more favorable conditions than we in this country have the right to enjoy, and that the tariff laws applying to California, Maine, Louisiana, or Massachusetts shall apply with equal force to the Philippines.

Now, then, we are presented with this question: If it is right for us to have our rate of taxation equal and uniform throughout every part of our country, why should we favor the Filipino at the expense of the American citizen? If the government there is running behind, if it has not sufficient revenue to support itself and to educate its people, why not make appropriations out of the Treasury, fairly and squarely, to support them if they are unable to support themselves?

Mr. Chairman, I differ, with a great deal of respect, from the learned gentlemen on our side who have submitted to this House a substitute, which seems to be incomplete, because it does not go far enough. We are asked by the substitute offered by the Democrats on the committee to vote for free trade between this country and the Philippines. To stop there is not Democratic. It is Democratic as far as it goes, but it ought to go further. It ought to apply the laws of the United States to the Philippine Archipelago. I believe in the enactment of laws which recognize the equal rights of all men before the law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will it interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question? Is it not true that we can not apply the Dingley tariff rates, or any other tariff rates, under our customs laws in general, around the Philippine Islands until the 11th day of April, 1909, by reason of the treaty with Spain?

Mr. PUJO. Well, I do not so understand it. I understand, under the treaty with Spain, that we are to give her the same advantage in the Philippine Islands that we enjoy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And for that very reason we can not have it until the 11th day of April, 1909.

Mr. PUJO. Then, if the gentleman from Missouri looks at it that way, it is possible he is absolutely correct. But I do not think that the Dingley bill will be an advantage to the Filipino.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it is a curse to the whole American people.

Mr. PUJO. That may be true, but what I contend for is that the laws should apply equally. I do not believe in free trade. We have no income-tax law upon the statute books of this country, and we are bound to raise between seven and eight hundred millions of dollars annually for the support of this Government, and we are compelled to raise the money by duties on imports and by internal-revenue taxes.

I believe the policy of the Democratic party to be that the necessary funds to maintain the Government should be raised by a tax on revenue-producing articles.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say further that I can not reconcile the position of the Democratic party upon this amendment—that is, the position of the minority of the committee reporting the bill—for the reason that it does not give equality before the law. If the gentleman from Missouri be correct, that the laws of the United States can not be applied to the Philippine Archipelago until the 11th of April, 1909, we at least, if we are to carry out the proper policy of our party, should insist that they go into effect and operation then. As I construe the bill, it threatens to tear down an industry which, in Texas and Louisiana, produces annually more than $12,000,000 worth of an article of food used generally by the people, and permits rice from the Philippine Islands to be shipped into the United States free of duty at a profit of a cent a pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PUJO. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the gentleman from Louisiana be willing to take, for the continental United States, the duty on rice now levied on rice coming into the Philippine Islands?

Mr. PUJO. If it were a duty proportionate to the duty imposed on other articles in the United States from which a revenue is derived. I am not willing to have particular interests in my State singled out to be discriminated against. The rice growers of Louisiana are willing, in a revision of the tariff which shall be general, to stand a diminution in proportion to the reduction of duties on other interests in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the gentleman to say he wanted an equality of duty by raising the duty on rice imported into the Philippine Islands, so that it would be as high as the duty on rice imported into the balance of the United States.

Mr. PUJO. The gentleman understands it entirely wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the gentleman wanted the Dingley rate extended to rice imported into the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PUJO. I want the law of the land to encircle the Philippine Archipelago just the same as it does the State of Louisiana. If the rate of duty on rice coming into the United States should be reduced to 1 mill per pound I would still be in favor of the principle, provided it applied uniformly to all its territorial possessions. It is not the amount of the percentage that makes the principle.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a matter of fact, the Dingley bill is the existing law now.

Mr. PUJO. So I understand it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, if the gentleman would have equality, he would have the rate of duty upon rice imported into the Philippine Islands fixed at the rate now existing in the Dingley bill?

Mr. PUJO. That would be the result.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be the result. Now, would the gentleman be willing to equalize the other way, by reducing the rate of duty fixed on rice imported into the continental United States to the rate fixed upon rice imported into the Philippines?

Mr. PUJO. Provided such a reduction would be proportionate to reductions on every other interest in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question.

Mr. PUJO. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think the gentleman means that, because it might leave the impression that he wished a horizontal reduction. The gentleman does not mean that he would be unwilling to reduce the rate upon any article unless there was an equal horizontal ad valorem cut in the duty on all other articles?

Mr. PUJO. No; I mean that in the event of a reduction of the tariff we should take revenue-producing articles, make up our budget of expenses, and endeavor to raise enough money to have it equalized upon all products brought into this country, so that this Government could be properly administered and its internal development continued. If protection should incidentally result from such revision, very well. But I do not want to see the interests of my section of the country discriminated against.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was what I wanted the gentleman to explain. I think the gentleman and I agree perfectly. What the gentleman wants is a tariff levied at the maximum revenue point without any regard to protection. If it incidentally protects, all right; if it incidentally does not protect, all right; but you want the duty fixed at the maximum revenue point?

Mr. PUJO. The maximum revenue point, having regard to the proper internal development of our country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course.

Mr. PUJO. Now, Mr. Chairman, this digression has led me away to some extent from the thread of my remarks, but I believe that in a general way I have practically expressed my views upon this question. I realize that perhaps I have not made the matter as plain to some of my friends upon the other side as I would have liked to do; but I believe that when they come to look into this question, being good American citizens, as they are, they will not inflict an injury upon and do a great wrong to the people of the South by insisting upon the adoption of this bill.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PUJO. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to learn something about this rice industry. In point of fact, is the rice produced in the Philippine Islands of an inferior quality to that produced in Louisiana?

Mr. PUJO. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. Rice is practically of the same quality all over the world. The different grades result from the milling. When the hull is taken off the rice by the milling process, or the old-fashioned mortar process, some of the beans break in a great many pieces and some remain whole. In other words, a barrel of rough rice, weighing 162 pounds, when milled will produce 100 pounds of clean rice. Of that there will be 40 pounds called head rice, worth 4½ and 5 cents a pound. The remainder will be broken rice, constituting the lower grades. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] the other day, in speaking of inferior grades, probably conveyed to this House the idea that different qualities of rice were cultivated, which I do not understand to be correct. It is only when a field has been cultivated a great number of years and the yield becomes impreguated, as you might say, with red rice, that a grade is produced which is considered inferior.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. In the early part of the gentleman's remarks I understood him to say that Japan, while a great exporter of rice, was also a great importer and consumer of rice, and that the Japanese exported high-priced rice and imported a cheap quality of rice. Is that merely due to the cutting or breaking of the grain or is it a different grade of rice?

Mr. PUJO. No; it is due to the different grades or classification after the milling or husking has taken place. There are different grades, due to the milling and husking, as I have stated, from the full white bean to broken rice, rice meal and rice flour, but there are not different grades as it is grown, although there are different varieties.

Mr. Chairman, the rice producers of the United States do not ask any special favors at the hands of the Government, but they feel that they should not be discriminated against. All that is asked is that a Filipino shall not be given any advantage over an American.

It is urged in justification of this legislation that revenue is necessary for the maintenance of those islands, and that, as they are compelled to import rice, the duty thereon should be low in order not to press too heavily upon them.

Conceding the correctness of this premise, it does not follow that a law should be passed which would enable speculators to buy rice produced in the Philippine Islands for a price not exceeding 2 cents a pound, and to ship the same to the United States at an additional cost not to exceed four-tenths cent per pound, and thus drive the American rice producer out of the market, injuring his interests, and ruining his investments. Rice produced in the Philippine Islands can be bought there and delivered at the city of New York for a less sum than it will cost the American rice grower to produce it and to deliver it to the market generally.

It is obvious, if this be true, that this great industry, which is yet only in its formative stages, will be struck down and languish until the injury inflicted by this legislation may be repaired by its repeal.

Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of common observation that the love of money in the United States and the love of its accumulation is so great that no opportunity to enter profitable speculation will be overlooked. It may be true that there are no capitalists in the Philippine Islands who will undertake to exploit this field, but there is capital in abundance in the United States aggressively searching for quick and large returns. No greater inducement could be offered than that which would present itself should this bill be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I am entirely persuaded that the Philippine Archipelago is a part of the United States, and should be so treated. It should have absolute free trade with every part of the United States and her other dependencies, but at the same time the law which applies to this country should be applied to the Philippine Islands.

For these reasons I can not obtain my consent to support this bill, for I fear that the rice industry of this country may be struck down by it.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I must beg the indulgence of the Members of the House for the brief time I shall take in attempting to talk on the pending bill. However, from the wide scope of the debate here, it is sometimes difficult for us to understand what the particular issue is we are talking about and what we are expected to talk about when we discuss this measure. We have gone over almost all the phases of the tariff on tobacco, of beet-sugar culture, of the raising of corn, of the raising and feeding and marketing of cattle, and so forth—all supposed to be pertinent to the question as to whether we shall extend to the Philippine Islands free trade in everything save tobacco and sugar. But this has only tempted me to talk a little, not exclusively upon the tariff question, but on the bill, if you please, and I certainly will keep within the range of somebody's talk within the last few days. [Laughter.]

I never made a purely tariff speech in my life and I will not try to make one now. About twenty-five years ago in this Hall I made what is now fulfilled prophecy in a speech less than ten minutes in length. I prophesied then that the only way to get rid of the college professor's theories about tariff and free trade was to try free trade in this country, and then we would have an object lesson that would educate the people of all classes here so completely that theoretic arguments would have little avail.

Now, I am very sorry to be embarrassed in attempting to make this speech, because I must differ from all parties apparently on this floor; that is, at least, the leaders of them. We have the two great parties represented by distinguished, able men, agreeing upon one thing, one proposition as the basis of their ultimate joint support of this bill. It belongs to the small things. It is the day of littleness. The leaders, Republican and Democratic, and their followers, have adopted the principle of the maxim of the law, de minimis non curat lex—the law pays no attention to small things. A western judge gave a free translation to that maxim and said that it meant, "the law goes with head and tail up." [Laughter.] So I say that the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Mississippi go together, "head and tail up," because they can support this bill for the reason, on the one hand, that there is not enough of free trade in it to hurt, and on the other hand that there is not enough of unconstitutionality and robbery in it to hurt upon that side. [Laughter.] This I want to say, parting, if I do, from my friend on the question of policy, that I want to minimize my action in whatever opposition I shall make to this bill by reading a little from the RECORD.

During an address on the 4th of this month, toward the close of that three hours and forty-five-minute speech by the distinguished chairman [Mr. PAYNE] of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. BONYNGE asked a question. I read:

Now, do I understand the gentleman to argue that there will be no benefit to the Filipinos by this reduction of duty?
Mr. PAYNE. I am doubtful about the benefit to the Filipinos.
Mr. BONYNGE. Regardless of whether it benefits the Filipino or not.
Mr. PAYNE. Well, it will benefit them in this way: It will give them courage. There is some sentiment in it. They believe it will help them.

I am always in favor, Mr. Chairman, of giving people courage, and I am not averse to sentiment, but I do not believe it is worth while for this Congress of the United States to undertake to pass a law merely because the Filipinos are deceived into the belief it will do them some good when it will not. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I read that clause, Mr. Chairman, to have it appear to my brethren that the small, if any, good that is hoped by the author of the bill is my excuse for believing it will not do any serious harm if not passed. De minimus. [Laughter and applause.]

We are not going to part company with those Republicans who support free trade on this bill. We may, for the present, shed a tear, but we love them so much that we will woo them back with us, and they will be found standing up here at an early date claiming that from the beginning of their existence they were stand-patters on the question of protection in the United States. We will welcome them home. I am not now ready to say to them, as did Ruth to her mother-in-law, Naomi—"Whither thou goest I will go," etc.

Now, there has been a great deal said incidentally by the Democratic free traders supporting this measure in the way of assaults upon the Republican party for its protective policy in the past. I have listened here and elsewhere to these assaults, coming from respectable sources, indicating through the years of protection that we of the Republican party have been a band of worse than lawless highway robbers; that we have stolen from everybody on every hand all that was possible to lay our hands on. We have been denounced as robbers in national Democratic platforms and all that, to say nothing of doing it in violation of the Constitution; but let me say that in this, too, I have some consolation, because with all our robbery we enter the year 1906 in a particularly good condition in these United States. I will ask the Clerk, to save me a little, to read what Henry Clews says happened in the last year of Republican protective robbery. I will ask that he will read the part marked.

NEW YORK, January 2, 1906.

The year just closed has been one of extraordinary business activity. It opened in the spirit of doubt; it closes in a spirit of almost dangerous optimism. In both volume and profit the trade of the past year has been much the largest ever experienced—farmer, miner, mechanic, merchant, and financier each having had their full share of the proceeds. In short, our national prosperity during the past year has far exceeded all previous records.

The most striking fact in the situation has been the farmer's remarkable prosperity. He is preeminently the principal factor in the national business activity of to-day. The country has been favored by a series of successful harvests, but that of 1905 surpassed all. Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, estimated the wealth produced on American farms this year at $6,415,000,000, which is $256,000,000 greater than 1904 and $498,000,000 in excess of 1903. Corn reached the highest production and value on record. Hay proved a large and profitable crop. The cotton crop, though short, is unusually profitable, and our wheat crop surpasses the record in value.

In other respects the year has been a profitable one to our agricultural classes, and Secretary Wilson estimates that as a result of five years' continuous good crops, and also to more intelligent methods of agriculture, the value of farms has increased 33.5 per cent, an amount approximately equal to $6,133,000,000. In consequence of this wonderful progress the American farmer, as a rule, is now not only out of debt but has a good balance in the bank. He is, therefore, a much larger buyer of the necessities and luxuries of life than ever before, and this fact is chiefly responsible for the present unusual prosperity of the West and South. The importance of this great accretion to national wealth will be appreciated when it is remembered that, if our agricultural products are correctly valued at $6,415,000,000, this sum is equal to almost $80 per annum to every man, woman, and child in the country. In one year American farmers have secured an amount of wealth equal to the entire capital stock of the American railroads and nearly ten times their net earnings. Such growth is simply astonishing.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I will not stop to comment upon this only to repeat again that with about eight years of protection under that law that is denounced as being so terrible in its operation we have brought the people of this country into a condition such as just described. Some people claim that that law has made individuals too rich. Grant that, Mr. Chairman, but it remains the fact that leaving them out of view the American people through all the classes are better off financially, better housed, better clothed, better fed, less in debt, and their children are more generally at school now than at any other time in the history of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, I may make mistakes about names, but I heard a gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] a day or two ago anticipate this talk about prosperity by that old, time-worn argument we have had ringing in our ears for at least the generation to which I belong. He told this House in rather excellent language and with a degree of earnestness that was commendable that it was not true that the good times and prosperity of the farmer and mechanic were attributable to Republican protective laws. He said it was due to Almighty God; that the Creator of the Universe had given us broad and rich fields and forests and opportunities and all that, and that prosperity had thus come.

Where was the Creator in the days of the Wilson-Gorman Act, when people walked, praying for work, the streets, almost maniacs, in all the great centers of business and commerce of this country? [Applause on the Republican side.] Soup houses grew up, notwithstanding the Creator's great things were then all about us. But I said this was rather an old argument. Prior to the 1st day of January, 1879, I heard upon the floor of this House, for two weeks, the most eloquent men the country ever produced, the most distinguished of that day or earlier—I do not compare them with the present statesmen here [laughter]—describe here the horrors that were to befall the people of this country when the day and hour came for resumption. They depicted the destruction and devastation, the poverty and bankruptcy, the shoeless children, etc., that would follow it; they painted pictures here that made us all feel sad, but when resumption came on that memorable New Year's day, it came as gentle as snow falls from the clouds, and prosperity budded out anew from it. Then came that cry, "Oh, the Republican party claims credit for resumption."

A distinguished Senator of my State said that the Republican party had nothing to do with it; that Providence brought it about. Good crops in this country and floods along the Danube and in other parts of Europe that destroyed their crops made resumption possible. So the Almighty got credit and condemnation both at once for bringing about resumption. More recently in the great national Democratic convention at St. Louis it was attempted to be demonstrated, as I understand from the reading of the speeches that were made there, that the gold standard was not established in this country by the Republican party, notwithstanding the law which it put on the statute books (March 4, 1900), in spite of the Democracy, fixing 25.8 grains nine-tenths fine of gold as a unit of standard. They told us on the stump in 1904 everywhere that Almighty God fixed the gold standard, because in the creation of the world He deposited a superabundance of gold in the mountains and in the valleys and in the bowels of the earth, where the miners had found it, and that was the way gold resumption came.

Now, I did not think anything strange of the gentleman from Massachusetts undertaking to say that protection had nothing to do with the good times, because he was only following the old argument. But, Mr. Chairman, reverently I say it, I am happy that my party advocates the things that the Almighty sees fit to work out and accomplish completely. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it seems that ought to be glory enough for us. And it may be said that the Democratic party, with the many things that it has had on its banner and under which it has gone down to defeat in the last fifty years, at least has been singularly unfortunate that the Almighty was not with them.

Well, Mr. Chairman, this bill is taken up by some whom we call "protective-tariff Republicans" as an indication that we are about to enter upon a matter of tariff revision. They say we have enough of free trade in the bill, and we have cut down the duty on tobacco and sugar, and that shows a symptom on the part of the stand-patter protectionists that we are going to revise the tariff. It is well to understand as we go along exactly what this bill is, because we have had but little said about it for some days. The bill provides for free trade in the introduction to this country of purely Philippine goods; the products of tobacco and sugar must be 25 per cent of the duties imposed on foreign imports under the Dingley law. The present duty on goods imported from the Philippines is 75 per cent of the Dingley tariff of 1897. The claim is that the bill can do no harm, and we heard the argument the other day and to-day, too, that it could do no harm, and as it is said it will do the Filipino people no good, then we say, let it go by. Such a bill is not worth our consideration. I want, in this connection, to call attention, if I can put my fingers upon it, to a further position of the Democracy here on this bill. It is found in the views of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee. They are not primarily in favor of this bill, but only in the way I first mentioned. I read from the minority views:

> In justice to both the Filipinos and ourselves they should be considered as altogether American or altogether foreign.

The distinguished gentlemen do not seem to be willing in that place to say which they want. They are more specific in the next line:

> So long as we retain them we favor the establishment and maintenance of free trade betwixt them and the United States.

From some of the talk I have heard here I gather there are Democrats who believe the Philippines are a part of the United States, but here the views of the minority indicate that they are not and ought to have free trade established by law betwixt them and the United States. I will read another sentence:

> The party which we in part represent desires to get rid of them at the earliest practicable moment, and we welcome the dissatisfaction of the hitherto legislatively favored classes, growing out of the competition of the products of Philippine labor with our own products in our own market as a possible moving cause to governmental divorce between the Philippine Archipelago and the balance of the United States.

In this clause the minority of the Ways and Means Committee seem to couple them in as a part of the United States. But it strikes me as somewhat peculiar that they have a sort of welling-up hope, as expressed here, that in time, some way or other, there will be enough dissatisfaction gathering around these Philippine Islands to lead to letting them go without regard to methods or conditions. I refer to this merely to show the inconsistency. The minority will vote, however, for a bill to secure the Philippine Islands free trade with the balance of the domain of the United States, thus putting those people on record in favor of free trade in these islands.

I notice from the remarks made yesterday and to-day that there is not entire unanimity on the other side of the House; but I pass that over that I may go along a little further. This party of Democracy that we are dealing with was once a great party. It was one of power and strength and patriotism; later on it became a party of some efficacy as a party of opposition; to-day it seems from all the indications that it has gone down to a third stage, and has become a mere party of criticism. Where next?

But we have some friends, Democrats and Republicans, that have told us some things about Massachusetts. Massachusetts has always been a great State, and the gentleman from Massachusetts yesterday told us the reason, and honestly, why it could not be in favor of protection. It seems to have gotten beyond the pale of production, and if that is so—and it is not, on examination of their statistics—but if it were so, I should not blame the people of the State of Massachusetts for being for free trade. Every man in the United States who does nothing and produces nothing is a natural free trader. [Laughter and applause.] And every man in this country who produces something for himself and for others is a man who wants to have some protection for himself, and in his generosity, for his neighbors also. [Renewed applause.]

Our Republican Massachusetts friends seem to have been scared over the recent Democratic platform, which demanded a revision of the tariff to the extent of having free hides, free coal, free lumber, and free iron ore. While over in Rhode Island, so handy that they can hardly be distinguished, the Democracy in 1905 went them one better, and added free wool. Now it is noticeable that these people stopped there. They never put anything on the free list, or suggested putting on the free list anything that they produced themselves. [Laughter and applause.] Even these Massachusetts free-trade Democrats subscribed in 1904 to the doctrine of the national Democratic party, that protection was a robbery and unconstitutional. They did not rest with that. But they scared some of our Republican friends up there. They elected Hon. W. L. Douglas—I believe those are the right initials—governor in 1904, and the newspapers told us the reason why they elected him. They said that the potential speech that made him governor was one to the effect that he made shoes and sold them for $3.50 a pair, and if they would take the duty off hides, he would sell them for $3. Well, of course, Massachusetts went Democratic on that. [Laughter and applause.] I looked into the question to see how liberal Mr. Douglas was. The highest estimate that I could find that the duty on hides would make in the cost of the leather in a pair of Douglas shoes was a fraction under 2¼ cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. Douglas in his indignation against protection added to the $3 the 2¼ cents that the leather had cost him in addition, and then put 47¾ on that as profit over and above. [Renewed laughter and applause.] He must be a generous sort of fellow to do that. That is not all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; I will do that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman wants to be fair, I know.

Mr. KEIFER. I always try to be fair.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would not interrupt the gentleman, if I did not know that he was misquoting ex-Governor Douglas's speech.

Mr. KEIFER. I was not quoting his speech, but just stating a fact. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I beg to differ with the gentleman entirely in the idea that he is making a statement of fact——

Mr. KEIFER. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech; he can answer me when I get through.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. What he did say was that he would sell shoes for 50 cents a pair less if the tariff was taken off of hides and leather and all shoe findings. If so, he could sell them for $3 a pair.

Mr. KEIFER. That is a case for applying the doctrine of de minimus; he might have added to it leather. He himself admits that it would not add much to the cost of the shoes. So that that answers the question. That leaves Mr. Douglas in the delightful condition that I understand he put himself in when he came here recently, as I am informed, when he said if they would take the duty off he would be glad to do this thing I have spoken of. He would sacrifice the 47¾ cents if he could get rid of the robbery of 2¼ cents. [Laughter.] He must be in the situation of that freed slave of North Carolina who lived in a hut in the woods and was in the habit of taking—I do not care to call it stealing—from his old master's flock sufficient hogs to put up his winter's meat. His old master got religion and went to him and said: "Now, I want you to be good and to quit stealing my fat hogs, and I will help you to quit. I will give you some pigs and you can slop them and raise your own." The negro said: "Not slop enough." Then the old master said: "I will give you six fat hogs in the fall, and you can put up your own pork." Then Uncle Ned said: "That sounds reasonable and fair, and I guess I will accept the proposition, but I am losing a mighty sight of pork." [Great laughter and applause.]

So I think Mr. Douglas would be losing a mighty sight of pork on that transaction.

Well, my friend Governor Curtis Guild, jr., got scared, as my friend over here yesterday [Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts] was scared. He was down here talking to the President about their fright in Massachusetts. Massachusetts is not all the United States. He wrote a letter and somebody read part of it here the other day, in which he told the President that if he and the candidate with him for lieutenant-governor had not taken to the woods and professed to be for tariff revision they would have got licked out of their boots this last year. That is the effect of it. Governor Guild is a brave fellow. He was a good soldier, as I can personally testify, and I hope he will make as good a governor of Massachusetts as he made an inspector-general of camps in Florida, Georgia, and Cuba; but he will have to be revised a little on the tariff question. [Laughter.]

Now, we are here dealing with a great many interesting things. The other Massachusetts man (Mr. SULLIVAN, I believe)—and I am so much of a "kid" here that I may make mistakes as to names [laughter]—in his very eloquent speech, when he was worked up to a little pitch by somebody interrupting, as they are in the habit sometimes of doing here when a gentleman is making a speech, something was said about the laborers, and he tiptoed beautifully and said, "I think the American farm laborers and mechanics are abundantly able to take care of themselves." Why not? I agree to that proposition; but I do not agree with it at all if you are going to have a power somewhere in the country to decree that the laborer of this country shall not take care of himself here, but shall be put in competition with the pauper labor of other countries of the world. [Applause.] If you let them alone they can take care of themselves, but if you insist on that proposition—that comes from some great sympathizing philanthropist, somebody who had gotten higher than belongs to common humanity, who had passed into a stage of Christian civilization never reached before—that is a different thing. There are some free traders who insist upon the claim that the way to get prosperity in this country, to get people in foreign lands to buy of us, is to quit producing at home and turn our laborers out and go there and buy of them. [Applause.]

That is a central idea of Democratic free trade. They say, "How can you expect European countries—Germany, France, England, Russia, and Italy—to come and buy goods of you here in your country unless you go over there first and buy of them?" Let us look at that question backward. Was anybody ever such a fool in England, France, Germany, or any other country in the world as to say, "The right way to get these rich Americans over in the United States to come and buy our goods is to go over and buy theirs first?" Why, they never thought of that. They are old stagers, and they do not think that is the way to do it. Now, I have not time to run this out at all, but another proposition is that there is danger that they will not buy what we raise.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] appealed for free trade for his people. Why, I know some of those people out there. I suggest that a market for his people and for others in the Missouri and Mississippi valleys, at Kansas City, St. Joe, Omaha, St. Louis, or Chicago, is worth ten thousand times more than a market among poor-paid people over along the Danube in Europe. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; but I do not want to get into a controversy with the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to participate in a controversy. I want to ask one question.

Mr. KEIFER. Go ahead.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it turns out that the American people can not consume all the products of the farms, all that we raise in the United States, would it not be wise to undertake to increase the foreign market for that surplus product?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes; that is a plain question. I do not want to get into a controversy with the distinguished and learned gentleman from Missouri. I know I am too young to go into that sort of an affair and come out safely. [Laughter.]

I listened to the gentleman's learning the other day with admiration. I recollect he made a pretty accurate quotation from Rabelais, written in the fifteenth century and recopied in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy in the sixteenth century. [Laughter.] I can not give the quotation as the gentleman did, but as I recollect it, it was:

> When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> When the devil got well, the devil a monk was he.

A great many liberties have been taken with that stanza. One of the more modern of them runs:

> When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> When the devil got well, the devil of a monk was he.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that is really any answer to the question?

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman from Missouri think it is? I agree with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it was a fine piece of pleasantry.

Mr. KEIFER. Thank you.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I want to know is if we can not consume our surplus farm products of the United States, would it not be wise to enter into some reciprocal relations with the hungry nations of the earth whereby we might increase the sale of our products to them?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; that is all right. I will come to that question of reciprocity that the gentleman and his party have so recently been converted to, very soon. [Laughter.] But let me say as a further partial answer that one thing is certain—I do not believe that the gentleman from Missouri will dispute this—that no people of any country in the world ever came to the United States and bought a pound of meat, a bushel of wheat, or a bushel of corn, or a barrel of flour, and took it over to their own country for consumption unless they were short themselves. They never bought anything that they could produce at home, and they never will; but they will buy of us that surplus that the gentleman is rightfully seeking to get rid of, whenever they have to have it, and not until then. [Applause.]

A few years ago something happened to the rye crop on the steppes of Russia and along the Danube and all through that German and Austrian country, and they had no rye. They use it for making bread. They had to have rye. We were raising out in our country, and in the gentleman's country in Missouri, as a sort of incident to farm products, where all the farmers you know, desiring a spring pasture, raise a little rye, not expecting to make anything out of its sale. It was worth 40 or 50 cents a bushel. When they wanted it for rye bread in Europe they sent over to the United States by cablegram to know whether we could furnish it. Well, there was a great hunting around of granaries and barns and stacks to get all the rye there was in the West. We sold that rye—all that could be scraped together—for a dollar to a dollar and a half a bushel. It was then our surplus, and we got rid of it because they had to have it. When their own crop grew we had to go back and plant it as we did before—for a little spring pasture, sometimes for feed.

I will not have time to talk about this matter of consumption, but I refer to the fact that it is amply demonstrated that this country can only be prosperous when we build up industries side by side with the farm and the plantation.

I live in a good agricultural country. I am not going to engage in any flight of oratory or any flowery talk about how the sun shines in central Ohio in my district or on my people, but we can raise as many bushels of corn to the acre, on an average, and likewise wheat and oats and things of that kind as anywhere else in the world. There are five counties in my district. There is no very large city within them. We have several small cities, and I live in one that has a population of about 40,000.

It is a fact shown on close investigation that we are not able to raise in my district enough agricultural products to feed us, and you will find that is the case in many places. We have to import many things. Am I to go out and say to my people: "Here, get out of these shops, get out of the International Harvester shop, get out of the great Turbine Wheel shop, get out of the American Seeding Machine shop, and let us go and buy such things as you make over in Europe, in order that they may be induced to come here and buy our farm products?" Everybody knows it is supremely absurd to suppose that a poorly paid people in a foreign country will pay us for our products of the farm, whether grain or meat, anything like as well as our own people will pay at home. Transportation is against them, and their poverty is against them. I could draw pictures, but I know I should not be indulged to talk long.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have time to complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have sufficient time to complete his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am thankful to the gentleman from Missouri and to the House. The theory of buying where one can buy the cheapest and selling where the highest price can be obtained is a captivating one, though in practice it is found to be wrong. We must often create a market for getting people employment, and thus create a market better than would otherwise arise.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, after this indulgence that the thing that the Democracy seems to me is now, and has long been confronted with, is one capable of being stated so that it will demonstrate its absurdity, and I therefore say that the Democrats here and elsewhere will require more persuasive argument and eloquence than its distinguished leaders possess to convice the people of this country that the free traders are the true guardians of their welfare and happiness. It will be impossible to make the plain, common-sense people of this country believe that with the Democratic party in power and under their free-trade management the farmers would get a high price for eggs, butter, and the like, while the city consumers could at the same time buy the same articles very cheaply; that cattle would bring to the farmer a high price and beef still be cheap in the market stalls; that wheat would bring a dollar and upward a bushel and bread could be sold two loaves for a nickel; that the machinists could receive $5 a day to do skilled work, while skilled labor should only be performed at home, save in competition with pauper wages abroad; in short, the foolish theory is that the manufacturer could pay high wages with or without manufacturing at home, and the farmer could get high prices for his products from those at home, who have little or no work and consequently nothing to buy with; that poorly paid people in foreign countries can pay the same for the farmer's or manufacturer's products, cost of transportation added, that our own people can pay when employed at high wages. Paradoxical as all this seems, it is the problem the theorist free trader is trying to maintain.

Now, my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and some others have arraigned the Republicans on this side of the House, and perhaps the party generally, for inconsistencies in connection with some views of Republicans. Mr. Blaine was mentioned, and others. It would be rather hard on some of us to hold us to any very strict line of consistency with all Republican leaders, dead and alive.

I know when there were those who staggered a little under the idea that this country was to be built up into prosperity by a protective tariff. I have witnessed some of that as well as my friend from Missouri. I know we had people at one time who thought that this country would get along and compete with the pauper people of Europe without aid, but it did not, and it can not now. The error that has crept in with a great many people of all parties when they come to view the question of the tariff is that if you will reduce the duty that that will only reduce, pro tanto, the price to the consumer. Take this illustration of hides that these Massachusetts people have been frightened so much about. They say to take off the 15 per cent, I believe, duty on raw hides would only cut down the price to the cattle raiser to that extent on his hides. This proposition is worthy of consideration. I will give you this as my illustration. If you take the duty off hides and you invite the hides from the Argentine Republic and from the plains of South America and have them brought in as they are generally—as freight on sailing vessels—and they have no duty against them they will soon bring hides enough to absorb the market and the hide market of the West will be what it was a few years ago.

I know in regions not far beyond the western border of Missouri where they did not stop to take the hide off the animals. They fed them during the period of the Wilson-Gorman Act—sometimes cattle, and even horses—to the hogs, hides and all. They were not worth skinning. That happened in Colorado. It happened in many regions in Kansas, my friend here says. I know it did in western Nebraska. Now, that is the trouble. You destroy the industry that is protected altogether. Why, they say in Rhode Island they want wool on the free list. We have had it. What was the consequence? They thought wool would go down in price a little and we would still have the same number of sheep and the same quantity of wool as before. If the duty on wool was now taken off our people would do as they did some few years ago—give their sheep away to people who would take them, and in many instances they killed and buried them rather than take care of them at all. This was the case in central Ohio and other places in the West. That is the difficulty we have under free wool——

Mr. CAPRON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CAPRON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in Rhode Island they desired to have coal upon the free list?

Mr. KEIFER. Wool.

Mr. CAPRON. Now, the gentleman mistakes Rhode Island, because it is so small, for Massachusetts. Rhode Island does not want wool upon the free list. It does not ask it and never has.

Mr. KEIFER. You misunderstood me to this extent. The Rhode Island Democratic platform of 1905 added wool to the list that was made up in Massachusetts.

Mr. CAPRON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I can understand anything from that source. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KEIFER. But we are coming to this question of consistency. There are a lot of things about consistency that will hardly pay to take the time to review. Democracy consistent on the tariff? Well, yes and no. We have some marvelous history on that subject. The first startling thing that came from leading Democracy was in the year 1832. The Vice-President of the United States, John C. Calhoun, left the chair and went to South Carolina, and there induced his State to declare nullification against the laws of the United States because a mild protective tariff was put upon goods that were being imported into Charleston Harbor. Unconstitutional was the cry then as now.

After some rather pointed, emphatic, and certainly patriotic talk from one Andrew Jackson, who happened to be then President of the United States, this nullification ceased, and the great leader of Democracy resigned the office of Vice-President of the United States and went back to the Senate as Senator from his State. About the first thing he did after getting there was to vote for a tariff law varying but little from the one he had just declared was unconstitutional.

But that was a long way back. Let us not go into much of that. Something was said about the great tariff law that Dallas voted for, and gave the casting vote as Vice-President of the United States, in 1846, I believe. My recollection is that Congress did not pass any tariff law then of any important kind, and that Dallas simply distinguished himself then because he violated the pledge he made as candidate for Vice-President and before he was elected, when on a tie vote in the Senate he voted to repeal the tariff act of 1842. I am a young man [laughter], yet I can recollect that in 1844 the Democratic cry rang throughout the North as it was emblazoned upon the banners of Democracy, "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842."

But let us get along a little further. Let us come up to 1883. I had something to do with the passage of a tariff bill which became a law on March 3, 1883. The Democrats denounced that act as unconstitutional throughout. It was denounced in every way.

I heard the distinguished men from North and South on the other side of the House then talk against the unconstitutionality of the act, and they denounced some of us for favoring it, because we would be perjuring ourselves. And some of them, when we were going over the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, voted to increase the duty on some things. I remember one was sumac. The Representative over there, from about Lynchburg, Va., wanted to raise the duty on that, for it was then about the only product of that region, now, happily, changed. Another Representative, who had made a long constitutional argument against this bill, voted to have a high duty put upon roasted, shelled peanuts, so that there would not be any competition with the peanuts raised in Tennessee. But that, too, was a day of small things. They could vote thus then, and now we have the same principle applied.

But we are talking about consistency. Blaine led his party to defeat in 1884, and after that we had a new régime. The act of 1883 did not have a fair trial. The Democracy did not enforce and work it out and it was repealed and another passed, called the "McKinley Act," of October 1, 1890. And this McKinley Act was in turn repealed by the Wilson-Gorman Act, of August 27, 1894.

Now, it will be remembered that the McKinley Act, of October 1, 1890, had the first appearance of reciprocity legislation that ever came to the Congress of the United States. It was a suggestion perhaps of Mr. Blaine, but it had gotten into the act of 1890. Well, Democrats were not very consistent about that, because they brought about some litigation, and the case went to the Supreme Court. It is called Field v. Clark. It will be found in the 143 United States Supreme Court Reports, page 697. The question there was whether reciprocity was constitutional. Justice Lamar, of Mississippi, writing a dissenting opinion, pronounced it unconstitutional, and Chief Justice Fuller concurred.

Some of the other judges dodged a little on it, and said the question did not arise fairly; but so far as we got the views of Democrats of the court, it was that the reciprocity section of the act was unconstitutional. But that is a small matter, maybe.

In 1894 the Democratic party passed what is called the "Wilson-Gorman tariff bill," and its seventy-first section repealed, in express terms, all the reciprocity there was in the prior McKinley Act, stating that everything that was done or attempted to be done in enforcing it that was inconsistent with the act of 1894 should be held null and void. So there is the legislative record.

Well, there was a little history right along there. The Democratic platform of 1888 was perhaps the most memorable on the tariff question we have ever had. If it had been practicable I would be pleased to have favored it. See what it was:

We, the Democratic party of the United States—

I put the heading—

resolve that we are in favor of cheapening the cost of living and increasing the price of the farmer's product.

[Laughter.]

By Jove, I am inclined to agree to that. But how can we cheapen the cost of bread, meat, eggs, and poultry to the consumer and at the same time increase the "price of the farmer's product?"

That was the national Democratic platform of 1888 on the tariff. It has been a remarkable party in new things. When I first entered politics the thing that struck me most, in 1876, was the wonderful facility of the Democratic party in settling great political questions, scientific as well. In its national platform of 1876, where Tilden was nominated, they tried to out-Herod Herod in condemning the Chinese. They resolved as ethnologists "That the Chinese race did not spring from Adam." [Laughter.] All remember it. The language, more precisely, you will see, was:

Resolved, That the Chinese race did not spring from the same parent stock that we did.

[Laughter.]

Now, I have always had a respect for a party that can settle a question, and it seems to have settled that one.

Let us look further. In 1892 we had a Democratic platform, and the chief plank of the national Democratic platform was a denunciation of protection as a fraud and unconstitutional.

Now as to reciprocity that my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] talked about. The Democratic party had another resolution on the subject of reciprocity. I would like to read part of it if I can turn to it without too much delay. I have found it. I read—listen, gentlemen:

We denounce the sham of reciprocity which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges by pretending to establish closer trade relations with a country whose articles of export are almost exclusively agricultural products.

They had just before that declared that the tariff was a fraud.

Now let us see—I must hurry along—if I can not find another place where reciprocity is mentioned. I am reading, Mr. Chairman, a part of the platform of 1904 of the national Democratic party. First, this:

We denounce protection as a robbery of the many to enrich the few.

I read now on reciprocity from the same platform. Remember in 1892 it was declared a sham and a jugglery to cheat the agriculturists, and that it had been legislated out of our statute books by a Democratic Congress. Conversion seems to have come to the Democratic party on reciprocity almost as suddenly as it did to Saul of Tarsus on his way to Damascus.

We favor liberal trade arrangements with Canada and with the peoples of other countries where they can be entered into with benefit to American agriculture, manufactures, and mining or commerce.

Here Democracy indorses the doctrine of reciprocity for the first. Strangely, Mr. Chairman, it seems to think reciprocity had become constitutional or at least that it would be innocent to follow it. I agree if you will put free trade and reciprocity side by side you will have no reciprocity at all.

There is no such thing as reciprocity without a tariff duty, so the Democracy stands for absolute free trade and then wants to trade that off for some sort of reciprocity with some country in the world. That is an innocent kind of reciprocity. This is the history of the matter with some little things left out. It is not very consistent, but these gentlemen are going to vote for this bill because it only has a little robbery in it, and there is not much room for reciprocity that could be based on that.

Now, I ought to be through, but I will talk a moment longer. While this thing was going on about the tariff, and reciprocity was declared to be the basic principle of Democracy in 1904, we had an election. A very excellent gentleman, a distinguished judge of New York (Mr. Parker), led the Democratic party. Indeed he somehow or other found that it was necessary not only for him to lead it, but to tell them that they did not know anything about certain subjects at all, as after they had unanimously voted a platform on the money question he told them that they were all wrong, and they took it back. Now, the election came. The people of this country, the kind I speak for—the farmer, the machinist, the mechanic, the laborer—took some interest in that election, and Mr. Roosevelt was elected President of the United States by a plurality of 2,549,331. Somebody said something about standing by the President on this tariff question. I should like to have the Clerk read a marked extract from what the President says on the question, and how it is to be dealt with if we are going to have revision; and if there is anybody who ought to listen to this it is the gentlemen from the State of Massachusetts.

There is more need of stability than of the attempt to attain an ideal perfection in the methods of raising revenue; and the shock and strain to the business world certain to attend any serious change in these methods render such change inadvisable unless for grave reasons. It is not possible to lay down any general rule by which to determine the moment when the reasons for will outweigh the reasons against such a change. Much must depend, not merely on the needs, but on the desires, of the people as a whole; for needs and desires are not necessarily identical. Of course no change can be made on lines beneficial to, or desired by, one section or one State only. There must be something like a general agreement among the citizens of the several States, as represented in the Congress, that the change is needed and desired in the interest of the people as a whole; and there should then be a sincere, intelligent, and disinterested effort to make it in such shape as will combine, so far as possible, the maximum of good to the people at large with the minimum of necessary disregard for the special interests of localities or classes.

Mr. KEIFER. I will not stop to make any comment upon that. Something has been said here in the course of the debate about the Philippines and their being interested in this bill, but it has been so little, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE] claims so little is to come from this bill, if it should become a law, that it requires very little time to be taken by me. I want to say a word about sugar. More than $150,000,000 worth of sugar is imported into the United States annually. A great deal of it comes from Germany—beet sugar—and beet sugar comes from various other countries. Now, I do not know what may be the ultimate outcome about the matter of raising sugar in the Philippines, but if it is a matter of sentiment, and we are going to pass this bill for the Filipinos for that reason—I do not know that they are so very sentimental—but it may be a matter of sentiment on the part of our people who have money that they would put into the beet-sugar factories and into the farms but for the menace of free sugar. There is a great deal of learning in this matter of farming. I notice my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] talked about the farmer and the cost of farm products, and of corn especially, the other day with a great deal of glibness. I do not think I could afford to come in conflict with the gentleman about that, but my testimony would be that he is greatly mistaken in some things.

He said, in effect, that it took about two bushels and a half of corn to plant an acre of corn; in other words, that it took a dollar's worth of 40-cent shelled corn to plant an acre. Well, if I had been called as a witness, with my knowledge of western farming, I would have said the cost of seed corn to an acre in the gentleman's district, and in Missouri and Kansas, averaged less than 5 cents per acre.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not at all certain but that what the gentleman from Ohio says is more nearly correct than the statement I made as a general proposition, but I was putting it at the highest point. I do not want to take the gentleman's time now——

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, go ahead.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. By some kind of a roping-in process that I have never understood there are people at Shenandoah, Iowa, in Colonel HEPBURN'S district, who sell seed corn for $2 a bushel. I never knew how they managed it, but I know they do it.

Mr. KEIFER. I have looked into that question, but I do not think the gentleman's constituents buy that corn. [Laughter.] I know they do not where I am interested, and I am a farmer in the West.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So am I.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand. We are both farmers. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If my constituents and the corn raisers of Missouri would take my advice they would never buy a bushel of seed corn in Iowa while the world stands. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I tried to introduce a new seed corn into Nebraska, and I came very near being excluded from ever going back there again. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to finish my statement. I would advise them never to buy a bushel of seed corn in Iowa, because we can raise as good seed corn in Missouri as they can raise anywhere, and you can raise as good seed corn in Ohio as there is anywhere.

Mr. KEIFER. But it does not cost more than about 5 cents per acre for seed corn. One bushel of shelled corn will plant in the usual way from 8 to 10 acres.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think you are more nearly correct about the average price than I was.

Mr. LACEY. Let me say to my friend from Ohio that the corn there in Missouri all runs to cobs and they work them up into pipes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They make about a half a million dollars a year out of corncob pipes in the district I live in. It is one of the greatest industries there.

Mr. LACEY. And no corn on the cobs. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is as much corn on the cob as there is in any county in the State of Iowa, and first-class corn, too.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEIFER. I yield to my colleague from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What I was about to say has lost its merit by delay. When the two gentlemen were supporting each other in the statements that they were farmers, I wanted to say that they do not either of them look the part. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You are correct.

Mr. KEIFER. I like the compliment, but I think there are slick fellows in my district who look better than I do and they are farmers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I will say that I think we look fully as much like farmers as we do like statesmen. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to give a little bit of experience that I have had in the beet-sugar raising. I do not belong to the people that are interested in raising beets for sugar, but I want to illustrate how we wise people talk about raising beets for sugar. I have investigated that question to the last degree. I do not think we can ever successfully raise sugar beets and manufacture them into sugar in Ohio. I went to Grand Island, Nebr., a few years ago and was bent on learning the cost of raising beets for the purpose of making sugar. After getting there I went over on the Platte River in beet-sugar land, and went into a field, where I found a man riding around in an open buggy giving directions about the harvesting of his crop. It was just harvest time. I said to him, "Do you know anything about the cost of growing beets?" "Yes," he said, "I know all about it. I raised these beets."

I noticed that he was a good deal better dressed than I am, or the gentleman from Missouri, and he had a fine horse, with ribbons in the bridle, and so on. He was driving along and there were men and women there topping the beets, and others were loading them into the cart to be carried to the factory. I said, "What does it cost to raise these beets?" "Well," he said, "I pay $5 an acre for the lease of this ground, so much for the seed, so much for preparing the ground, so much for planting, so much for thinning—not 'suckering,' as was stated here the other day—and then so much for cultivation, and then what you see going on here now, and it all amounts to about $45 an acre." I said, "How many tons of beets do you get?" He said, "Nine." I said, "What do you get at the mill?" He said, "$5 a ton." So you see that he was coming out plumb even. I went along further in the gloaming of the evening and came out at a field and saw a little stubby, red-headed, Teutonic-German-like fellow—like the one my friend, Mr. CLARK, described and claimed to be the other day—and he had a flock behind him, consisting of a wife and several children, so modest that they scurried off into the brush as I came up. I asked him who owned the beet field that he came out of, and he said he owned it himself. I said, "What does it cost to cultivate and raise an acre of beets." He said, "$5." I thought the difference was only $40 between the two, and I would look into it a little.

He was evidently a man of truth. I questioned him, and he said he paid cash for the seed, and complained that somebody had put up a job on him, and he had to pay too much. He talked about some other expenses, such as for hands to help thin out the beets. I asked him who did the balance of the work. He said he and the old woman and the children. They did $40 of the work on an acre. He had about 60 acres of beets. He said they would average about 12 tons to the acre, and it would cost him about $5 an acre to raise them. Mr. Chairman, all these farmers—not such as we have here—never count their own work in estimating the cost of raising corn or other things of that kind.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of doing in this country all that is necessary through legislation, even higher protection than we have now, if you please. I am in favor of going on and on in this beet culture or this beet-sugar manufacture until we are independent of the whole world on the subject. [Applause.] We have better sugar lands, we have more of them in this great Northwest than there is in any other country in the world. You may minimize the region for growing sugar in the Philippine Islands; you may limit them in Cuba, but you can hardly limit them in the great Northwest. I know we are not a beet-sugar country where I live. We have tried the experiment, and I, like my friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL, think many of these factories failed, and are bound to fail, because of natural causes.

Why, they understand it. Beets must be raised where there is much sunshine in the fall of the year. I will illustrate. The Oxnards were engaged in raising beets at Grand Island, in Nebraska, and one year they prepared to make a larger quantity of beet sugar than usual, because the season had been such that the beets had grown double the usual size, and everything looked prosperous, and yet after a week or two trial they shut down their mill and did not make sugar at all that year to any great extent. Why, they had a great overgrown sugar beet that had been raised with plenty of rain all the season to make it grow in size, with little sunshine, as it happened, throughout the year, and there wasn't sucrose enough in the beet to be worth making it into sugar at all. Scientifically I can not explain it, but if you have only 10 per cent of sucrose in the beet there is an acid or virus of some kind in the same beet that in the process of manufacture consumes that 10 per cent of sucrose. If you have 11 or 12 per cent, you can make sugar and get the per cent above the 10. If it is 14 per cent it is rich, and that is the philosophy of it as nearly as I can give it.

If you go into New York and build your mills, you are liable to have too little sunshine most years, and the beets will not be worth harvesting for the purpose of making sugar. I was amused at the statement, I believe, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] about these by-products—the waste material—the pulp of the beet—selling at $14 a ton. I looked into that also, and I can tell you it will not sell for 14 cents a ton at any of the sugar mills out West, because it is not worth anything. It is nice looking, but it is so poor it will not even rot. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. If my friend will allow me, a sugar producer in Michigan testified before our committee that it sold out there at $14 a ton.

Mr. KEIFER. He cheated somebody, then, certainly, because the Armours went out near Grand Island and put up an establishment to use this pulp and they spent a great deal of money, and when I was there there were ricks of it nearly a quarter of a mile long which had been there for over three years, and there was not anyone who would buy it. The only way it was used at all was to mix rough ground corn or other stuff with it and in that way make it palatable. It contains no substance, and stock would starve on it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman says the pulp sold at $14 a ton. Now, does it not take from 10 to 12 tons of green stuff to make a ton of dry pulp?

Mr. KEIFER. That is all right, but the pulp is not worth anything when green.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; not a cent.

Mr. KEIFER. I am glad to have your testimony.

Now I must close, leaving the tobacco question untouched. Others have, however, said enough on it.

I want to say a word about this matter of the Philippines belonging to us. There has been a whole lot of talk about that. The old Democratic doctrine was that the Territories did not belong to the United States—that the Constitution did not extend over them. In the Thirtieth Congress, as I recollect it, in 1848–49, John C. Calhoun induced Senator Walker, of Wisconsin, to introduce an amendment to an appropriation bill in the Senate, providing that the Constitution of the United States should be extended so as to cover the Territories of the United States. The exact language used was "to extend the Constitution of the United States to the Territories." This led to a six weeks' debate in the Senate, and the Senate agreed to the amendment, but it failed in the House. The doctrine of Democracy was that the Constitution did not cover the Territories, but the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scot case somewhat limited that doctrine and said that the Constitution of the United States (in the syllabi of the case, which will be found in 19 Howard) did apply to territory that belonged, at the time the Government was formed, to the original thirteen States, but not to any territory acquired afterwards. I do not know whether this is Democratic doctrine now or not, but that was the doctrine of Chief Justice Taney and a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States when that case was decided, March 6, 1857.

The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the territory and other property of the United States, putting territory and other property all in the class of property. That is a sufficient guaranty that we may deal with this territory as we please. If it is our property, we may deal with it as we please, and there is nothing unconstitutional in legislating for one territory different from another. We have done that all through the history of the country. The ordinance of 1787, though passed by the old Continental Congress before the Constitution was adopted, extended certain things to the territory northwest of the Ohio, and that ordinance was reenacted by the First Congress of the United States for fear it would not be operative, under the Constitution; and then we had other territory that was brought under government with an opposite policy. So we have been running all the time all through the history of this country, and I think we may now legislate for the Philippines by giving free trade or protection, one or the other. I have no trouble with the constitutional question as to that. But I must close. I do not believe that there is enough of sentiment in this bill to justify anybody voting for it. I believe it is dangerous as a precedent.

I am not at all sure but what the argument that is made here, that it would not be immediately injurious, is a sound one, but I do not like such arguments and I do not like such experiments. I do not believe, myself, that any good result will come from its passage, or any disadvantage result from its defeat. We can wait a little longer. We are approaching the ten-year limit—April 11, 1909. We can see whether these people are to be civilized or not. I know I do not know as much about these Filipinos as those gentlemen who traveled across the sea to witness them, but the next best thing I could do to get some learning on this subject was to go to the Louisiana Purchase Exposition at St. Louis. I went up on the hill and there saw some of the Filipino people. I never was so much amused in my life as I was when on getting there I found standing upon a granite rock, or some kind of a stone, a Negrito, or Igorrote, or a head-hunter in his natural habilaments singing—"My country, 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty; of thee I sing," etc. [Applause and laughter.]

There I had the living example. A little incident happened. I was looking around to see who was watching this demonstration of love of country by this peculiar fellow. I saw a lady, Miss Dawes, from Massachusetts. I had not seen her for a score of years. She had tears glistening in her eyes and she was laughing at the same time. I had seen her under other circumstances. I remembered then that she came here to the Hall of this House one morning before it met in session and went before the Appropriations Committee, that was almost adamant at that time, when the great Randall was the chairman of it, and she converted the members of that committee into sympathizing people in a speech of fifteen minutes, and we came in here and asked the House to appropriate $50,000 at that woman's instance, to be used to send a relief expedition toward the North Pole to hunt up the Greely party, supposed to be up there some place. And the expedition was sent, and it arrived there just in time. A day longer would have been too late. It was in time to snatch Greely and those of his party which still survived from death to life. Well, here was this same woman out there, looking at the tropical products, not the arctic.

Now, I do not believe, my friends in the Republican party, that we are going to be torn up or divided very long on our side, and I think they will not be on the other. We will soon be together. We will line up. There are times when there are stragglers from a great army that is moving forward, but when there is great work to do—when the battle is on—its ranks will close up and all will stand together. We will stand together for that protection that has brought so much of good, so much of civilization, so much of greatness to this great Republic of ours. I thank the House. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of a letter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLUMBUS, GA., December 14, 1905.

Hon. W. C. ADAMSON, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We request that you give your careful consideration to the very important question of the prohibitory tariff that is being imposed by certain European countries, which are adding oppressive duties upon American products going to their countries, and especially on our main product and the South's great product—cotton-seed oil. We call your special attention to the proposed Austro-Hungarian tariff, which is likely to go into effect in February, 1906, which will be prohibitory on any cotton-seed oil being shipped from this country to them, and if this tariff does go into effect it will absolutely destroy a market amounting to some millions of dollars for cotton-seed oil alone.

The new German tariff also raises the duty on cotton-seed oil 25 per cent, and it seems that there is an agitation in France and Italy looking into putting an increased tariff on our product of cotton-seed oil.

It seems that these countries are imposing this tariff because our American tariff on products from their countries is unreasonably high, and we very much favor a reasonable reciprocal concession in our tariff.

We come to you with this matter because it will do a great injustice to the South if a ready market can not be found for our product—cotton-seed oil—at all times. Therefore we ask your careful consideration and request that you do everything possible toward preventing foreign markets from practically closing their doors against cotton-seed oil.

Thanking you in advance for any assistance you can render us in this matter, we remain,

Yours, truly, GEO. E. STRUPPER, Manager.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for its attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Chairman, it would have been a much easier matter for me personally to have remained passive during this debate and to have quietly acquiesced in that which appears to be the will of the entire Democratic membership of this House, with possibly two or three exceptions, and that which, I am sorry to say, will probably be the recorded vote, but not the deliberate judgment, of the majority of the Members on this side of the Chamber. But, in justice to myself, as it is given me to see the right, and in fairness to that part of our common country which I alone have the honor to represent on the floor of this House, I would be recreant to that which I at least conceive to be my duty were I not to raise my voice in protest against the passage of this bill as it now stands.

With a change of one vote in the Committee on Ways and Means and this bill, as it now reads, would have never been reported.

So far as I have heard, either in this debate or in private conversation with my fellow-Members, I have heard no reason advanced that the passage of the bill would result in any material benefit to the people of the United States.

It is not even claimed by its advocates that it will in any way cheapen the cost of refined sugar to the people of the United States, nor that it will, by so much as one penny, increase the revenue that is so sorely needed at this time.

In the outset, I want to say that, except so far as the commodities of the Philippine Islands are concerned that do not come into competition with products of our own farms and factories, I have no objection to their importation into the United States duty free; but in as far as these competitive products, produced by the labor of a semicivilized people, at a wage of from 15 to 30 cents per day, I am opposed to their free competition with the products of our own people.

In saying this I want to be fair enough to also say that I do not believe the admission, free of duty, into this country of Philippine sugar and tobacco will annihilate those industries in the United States, but I do believe their free admission is a step in the wrong direction and one not called for by present conditions or any moral obligation on the part of the people of the United States to the inhabitants of the Philippines.

The occurrences of the past week during the progress of this debate have appeared most peculiar to that portion of the membership of this House who with the opening of the Fifty-ninth Congress had just graduated from the "kindergarten class" of the Fifty-eighth Congress. Those of us who during those two years have sat so patiently at the feet of the Gamaliels on this side of the Chamber and learned the lesson from their lips that it was better for us to sometimes curb our own individual conviction, so as to allow it to coincide with the combined wisdom of more experienced gentlemen—the men whom Colonel HEPBURN in the early part of this session referred to as "white-buttoned mandarins" [laughter]—on this side of the Chamber; to those of us who have listened to the admonitions of these gentlemen, admonishing us from time to time to "stand pat," who taught us anew the principles of the Republican party, find it difficult to understand the present condition of things.

When the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, that eminent gentleman whom we all respect, and whom we all listened to with great interest in his two hours' explanation of this bill as to why it should pass, from the standpoint of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee; when we heard his speech and heard from the other side of the Hall the applause which came from those gentlemen there; when we heard words of praise that fell from the lips of that great free-trade champion, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the gentleman who a year or two ago in this Chamber delivered his celebrated philippic in advocacy of tearing down the custom-houses of the country—when we heard these things, gentlemen, some of us began to wonder where we were drifting.

I heard the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] the other day in a two hours' speech in defense of this bill, and I confess it was interesting and sometimes it was eloquent, and when he had concluded I want to say, in all frankness, that I felt like exclaiming, "Almost thou persuadest me to become a Filipino." [Laughter.] But when the spell of his eloquence had passed, and I began to regain my normal condition, I could not help but wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether or not, as a Member of the American Congress, I was participating in a "Committee of the Whole House having under consideration the present state of the Union" or whether I was in attendance on a Filipino missionary society. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the applause that came from the Democratic side of the House in response to those speeches from these distinguished gentlemen might have tickled the fancy of those who delivered them, they might have recognized in that applause "the voice of Jacob;" but to me, gentlemen, as I saw it, it was the same hairy hands of that same old free-trade Democratic "Esau" [laughter] who for the past fifty years has led the assault on the Republican policy of protection to American labor and industry from the pauper-paid labor of foreign countries. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have tried to listen intelligently to the speeches that have been delivered on the floor of this House in favor of this bill and those which have been delivered in opposition to it; I have read most of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee; I have in conversation with my fellow-Members tried to learn somewhat of the reasons which actuated them in voting for or against the bill. I think I am frank and honest in stating the question that so far as the arguments advanced in support of the bill from the Democratic side of the House are concerned they have been based on the one argument alone that the Democratic party is in favor of free trade with all countries—why not the Philippine Islands? Sometimes you have sugar-coated that doctrine a little bit in order to make it have a little bit better taste in the mouths of the people in certain parts of the country, but the actual doctrine so oft proclaimed by you in this House and in your platforms has always been that the Democratic party of this country stands for free trade.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes, sir.

Mr. MACON. You say that the Democratic party is in favor of free trade. Will you please quote one single declaration in any of its national platforms in favor of free trade?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me suggest that the Democratic national platform declared, "All forms of protection are robbery of the many for the benefit of the few." [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MACON. It does not say free trade. The Democratic party in its platform has uniformly said it was in favor of a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have quoted the words of your platform of 1892.

Mr. MACON. But it does not say free trade.

Mr. GROSVENOR. "All forms of protection."

Mr. MACON. "Protection," yes; but that does not mean free trade by any manner of means.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman will have a hard job to make anybody understand it any other way.

Mr. MACON. And you will have a hard job making anybody with sense believe that it is free trade. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I thank the gentlemen for the very entertaining discussion that has just taken place in my time. I thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] for calling the gentleman's attention to the declaration of the last national platform of the Democratic party.

Mr. MACON. Do you assume that that is an answer to my question?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I will say to the gentleman who has just addressed me that I heard one of your distinguished champions, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], I think it was, who said on the floor of this House that he was in favor of tearing down the custom-houses. If I mistake not, I heard the gentleman from New York, Mr. BOURKE COCKRAN, in the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, reiterate on this floor that he would "tear them down from turret to foundation stone." [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, whether that be the brand of Democracy that the gentleman is answering for I do not know, but when CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, and BOURKE COCKRAN, of New York, unite in saying that this one thing is a genuine Democratic proposition, I, as a Republican, would naturally accept it as true. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MACON. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that while I have a high regard for the gentleman from Missouri and a little less but not quite so high regard for the gentleman from New York [laughter], I want to call attention to the fact that the Democracy of this great nation does not recognize the utterances of either of these gentlemen as being the enunciation of the party.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I would ask the gentleman whether he accepts as genuine Democratic doctrine the utterances of the Democratic national platform adopted at St. Louis last year, which declares that "all protection is robbery?"

Mr. MACON. Well, it is robbery in a sense; yes, sir. [Laughter on the Republican side.] It is robbery in this sense, that it takes from one without his consent something to protect some one else in the building up of himself or his business. It impoverishes the one to a certain extent and enriches the other, which, in my judgment, is wrong.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Then, I will reply to the gentleman by saying that I heard the very distinguished leader of the Democratic party in this House [Mr. WILLIAMS] on yesterday, in a colloquy with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] as to the relative degree of larceny involved in a protective tariff, illustrating it by saying that the present tariff bill, which we have under discussion, was petty larceny, because it only provided for a 25 per cent protection so far as the products of the Philippines were concerned, while the present tariff between the United States and the Philippine Islands was grand larceny, because it provided for a 75 per cent tariff between the Philippines and the United States. Therefore, so far as the Democratic leader in this House is concerned, he considers a protective tariff either petty or grand larceny, depending on the degree of protection involved.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is here and is able to take care of himself. So I will let him answer for himself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman will do me the justice to remember—because it was only yesterday and it does not require a very great effort of memory—that the tariff we talked about was a tariff between one part of the United States and another part of the United States, and had no reference to the general tariff law of the United States at all. Now, if the gentleman will yield to me just one moment further, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has quoted what he says is the utterance of a Democratic platform that "all forms of protection are robbery." He can not find any Democratic platform or Democratic utterance saying that all forms of tariff taxation are robbery. The Democracy contends that a tariff imposed for the purpose of collecting duties to carry on a government, not only economically but effectively, is not only a constitutional tax, but may be a very just one, and assuredly neither the gentleman from Montana nor anyone else will contend for one moment that there can be any such a thing as free trade in the United States. The gentleman must admit, as everybody does admit——

Mr. DIXON of Montana. If the gentleman will ask me a question I will answer it. I do not want the gentleman to make a speech in my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am merely correcting a statement made by the gentleman about what he calls a statement made by myself. That was why I asked him to let me interrupt him, not to ask him a question.

Now, the Supreme Court of the United States having decided that an income tax is not constitutional, and it being necessary that this Government should be run by some form of taxation, a tariff for revenue is neither robbery nor is it unconstitutional, and even the utterance that all forms of protection are robbery is not an utterance in favor of free trade.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Then if it was not for the purpose of raising revenue for the use of the Government, I understand the gentleman would be in favor of free trade between all countries of the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman even in that would not be altogether fair, because I might consider it even then proper and right and equitable and easy to raise a part of the revenue by a tariff.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Then I would say to the gentleman that he does not agree with the doctrine of Democracy preached by Hon. BOURKE COCKRAN, of New York, or Hon. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think I do.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I started to say, before I was interrupted by the questions from the other side of the House, that the argument of our Democratic friends in favor of supporting this bill is because it is a step in the direction of free trade, which, sugar-coated, as explained by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], is what I conceive to be the logical Democratic doctrine; and they have welcomed some of the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of the bill on this side of the House as having advanced a step toward a position heretofore occupied by them. And when I heard this exchange of courtesies between these brigadier-generals of this body, the men whom I have seen heretofore meet on many a hard-fought field of battle, I could not help but wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether or not they were forging their political swords into the pruning hooks and plowshares of a political peace.

The argument advanced by the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber has been to the effect that it is purely a question of sentiment. They have argued that we have extended free trade to Porto Rico, that we have extended it to the Sandwich Islands, and therefore our plain "moral duty" was also to extend it to the people of the Philippine Islands. So far as I am concerned, I can not possibly conceive but that that argument is a fallacious one. The island of Porto Rico lies at the very door of our eastern ports. The Sandwich Islands lie at the door of our western ports. They are a part of this Republic, geographically, strategically, and as a matter of the permanent national defense. The Philippine Islands are not. They can not be and never will be a permanent part of this Republic. They are ours temporarily as the resultant circumstance of war. This Congress has never recognized the fact that they stood in the same relation to the people of the United States as do Porto Rico and the Sandwich Islands. We have expressly declared in our legislation that they rest on an entirely different proposition from Porto Rico and the Sandwich Islands. We have never placed them in the same category with reference to the tariff laws. The bill under contemplation does not place them on the same plane as Porto Rico and the Sandwich Islands.

Congress has recognized our permanent possession and occupancy of Porto Rico and the Sandwich Islands by placing them within the operation of our own tariff laws. The Philippines, on the contrary, are operating under a separate tariff of their own that is in no manner akin to the spirit of our own tariff laws.

Some gentleman has argued during this debate that we should enact this legislation as our portion of "the white man's burden." We already have enough of a burden in trying to assimilate the mass of humanity that is yearly landing at the ports of our eastern shore without undertaking the experiment of making American citizens of an alien people living on the opposite side of the globe.

We have heard much in this debate of "our plain duty."

To me the path of "our plain duty" in this matter is not in the least obscure. I was once taught the scriptural admonition that he that provided not for his own household is worse than an infidel. This axiom transposed into modern, everyday English would read, "The Member of the American Congress who would sacrifice the material well-being of his own race and people to engage in a philanthropic crusade among an unwilling lot of semicivilized people in the Philippine Islands had better first learn the lesson that true charity always begins at home," and that "our plain duty" in this case is first toward the people of our own country.

Mr. Chairman, I have here in my hand a statement issued by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, which, I believe, is not to be released until to-morrow, giving certain data in regard to the sugar importation into the United States. It says that we are yearly importing into this country about $150,000,000 of raw sugar every year.

This great Republic, with every possible resource at its command, with all favorable conditions for production at home, has advanced to a point where every other article of commerce used in everyday life, except some productions of tropical islands, is already produced by the people of the United States. Ten years ago the people of this country began an experiment in the growth of the sugar beet. To-day Austria, Germany, France, and Belgium, and practically every country of continental Europe, produces its own sugar-beet supply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have time to complete his remarks.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I can not consent to that. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Oh, I think fifteen minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Montana be extended fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I started to say that to-day the experiments carried on in this country regarding the production of beet sugar have passed the experimental stage. To-day we are producing 300,000 tons of beet sugar annually, and at the same ratio of increase for the next ten years as in the past ten years we will be producing every pound consumed by the people of this country. There are certain peculiar conditions existing in the United States for the production of our own entire supply of sugar. In the Rocky Mountain region, which has been referred to in this debate by my friend from Colorado as what was formerly known as "the Great American Desert," there exists, Mr. Chairman, a peculiarly favorable condition for the production of twice the amount of sugar that this country could possibly consume.

The trouble heretofore has been, Mr. Chairman, that in that irrigated portion of the West there has not existed a sufficient amount of irrigated land at any one especial point to insure from year to year a permanent and continuous supply of the sugar beet for the successful operation of beet-sugar factories.

Three years ago, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, Congress enacted the national irrigation act, which, and I do not exaggerate, meant more for the development of the country than any single measure ever enacted into law by the American Congress. The people of the East are just beginning to realize the economical revolution that this beneficent legislation is beginning to work.

The area of irrigated lands under the present authorized Government canals in the State of Montana alone, which do not constitute one-tenth of the area that will be covered when the scheme shall have been finally worked out, will produce 600,000 tons of sugar every year, and that is not taking into account the area already under irrigation by private enterprise.

It is already demonstrated by the Department of Agriculture that the saccharine matter contained in the sugar beet is in direct proportion to the cool, even temperature in which it is grown and the high latitude that gives the longer period of daylight for the formation of sugar in the growing plant.

The National Irrigation Congress, which met at Ogden in 1903, realized the importance of this new industry in conjunction with the rapid development of irrigation in the West by unanimously adopting the following resolution:

Whereas the culture of sugar beets is already one of the most important industries of the arid West; and

Whereas our home market now requires the annual importation of over $100,000,000 worth of this commodity, the most natural product that can be produced under irrigation and shipped in great quantities to our large centers of eastern population; and

Whereas under the national irrigation act the culture of beets will afford our greatest quick-money crop; and

Whereas it is being urged that the United States Congress further stimulate the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands by reducing our tax upon Philippine sugar, by increasing the present limit of 2,500 acres, which individual corporations can now hold to 25,000 acres, and by the introduction of contract cooly Chinese labor: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we hereby protest against the enactment of any legislation which will tend to arrest the full development of the American sugar industry by extending further concessions to the employers of cheap Asiatic labor; that we are unalterably opposed to the introduction of contract cooly labor wherever the American flag floats, and that legislative agitation or attacks on the sugar interests of this country should cease, to the end that this great industry may develop in common with all our other great industries.

And again, in 1904, at El Paso, Tex., they unanimously adopted the following:

It is the sense of this congress that the irrigated lands of the arid and semiarid West are demonstrated to be admirably adapted to the production of beet sugar, and therefore we favor such national legislation as will tend to encourage that industry on such lands.

The late Professor Powell, of the Smithsonian, estimated that there was arid land enough in the West, and water enough to irrigate it, that when developed would ultimately support a population of 70,000,000 people.

In the State of Montana alone we now have five sugar-beet factories in contemplation, and the money has already been subscribed for three of them.

This bill does not mean cheaper refined sugar to our own people. The sugar trust is the only one who will benefit by its provisions here at home. It only means that we are voting a subsidy, indirectly, of $35 per ton to the Philippine sugar planter at the expense of our own farmers here at home. It only means that we are, so far as the production of the Philippine Islands go, placing our farmers in direct competition with the peon 15-cent laborer there.

We have heard much in this debate from the gentlemen who are urging the passage of the bill of the languishing conditions of the sugar and tobacco business in the islands.

There was much testimony submitted before the Ways and Means Committee relative to the cost of producing raw sugar there.

I have here some direct testimony of my own to offer in support of our contention that the "poor Philippine sugar planter" is not in such desperate straits as some of the gentlemen would have us believe.

In talking with an army officer the other day, who was stationed in the Philippines with the Sixth Infantry in 1899, he gave me some very interesting facts relative to sugar culture there. His name is Major Torrey, now on special detail at the War College here, and an officer of very distinguished merit.

Major Torrey tells me that in 1899 he was stationed with his command on the island of Negros and while there became rather intimately acquainted with one Dom Pedro Yulo, a large sugar planter of that island. He was a native Viscayan and owned a plantation of some 12,000 acres, comprising some thirty-two separate haciendas; that becoming interested in the sugar business as carried on by Señor Yolo, Major Torrey asked him concerning the cost of producing same and the average profits from year to year. At the Major's request Señor Yolo wrote down in his notebook the following memorandum in his own handwriting. Here it is:

	Pesos.
250 acres of second-class land, including fixtures	20,000
This amount of land will produce on an average of 4,000 piculs (133⅓ pounds) of sugar, at 4 pesos per picul, worth	16,000
For expense of producing 4,000 piculs, at 2.25 pesos per picul	9,000
For duty and expense in selling at Iloilo	2,000
For repairs and depreciation of plant	1,000
Interest on investment of 20,000 pesos, at 6 per cent	1,200
Total cost	13,000

Leaving a balance for profit of 2,800 pesos, or 14 per cent net profit on investment after paying interest charges and cost of production.

Surely an industry that is paying a total profit of 20 per cent per annum is not in desperate need of such measure of radical relief as is proposed in this bill by giving it what will amount to an actual bounty of $35 per ton on the raw sugar produced there, and that at the competitive expense to our own growers of sugar beets in the West.

You gentlemen remember the cry that went up here in the East twenty years ago, when the Republican Congress proposed to put a prohibitive tariff on the further importation of tin plate and plate glass. You remember the howl that went up also from the gentlemen occupying the other side of this Chamber. The tin-plate and plate-glass industry at that time had not yet advanced to the permanent state, as has the beet industry of the West, and yet during that twenty years, notwithstanding the opposition of the Democratic party, the beneficent legislation of the Republican party in placing that tariff upon those then foreign products has resulted in building up those industries in the East until to-day every dollar's worth of those articles of commerce are produced here at home.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the West stood shoulder to shoulder with the East when that assault was made upon your industry, and we are now asking that you do not desert us in the time of our need. [Applause on the Republican side.]

While I reiterate that I do not believe that the enactment of this law will mean the extermination of the beet-sugar industry, I would again reiterate that it is a step in the wrong direction. And I venture to assert that if this bill carried with it as great a threatened menace to the iron, glass, and woolen-goods industries of the East, it would never have seen the light of day in this House.

I want to read this extract from an article by a gentleman who was once the idol of this House, as distinguished a statesman, I apprehend, as ever sat in this Chamber. It is almost prophetic of the question that we are discussing now. In an article written by him for the North American Review in December, 1902, ex-Speaker Reed used the following language:

For the Republicans to desert the beet-sugar interests is to desert the farmer in the one conspicuous and clear case where his industry is fostered. Under the tariff as it now is all the sugar needed for this country can be made by the people of this country. This is in accord with our system. It is a part of our system and should not be abandoned until the rest of it is abandoned. When we throw our markets open to the world in all things, then it will be time to do it on sugar.

While I fully appreciate the kind feelings that actuate those who want to extend a helping hand to the Filipino, it is a good deal like the president of that New York insurance company, who, in explaining to the investigating committee why his company had gone into foreign countries after life-insurance business when the business gained there was at a tremendous loss to the policy holders here at home, explained that in his view of the matter modern life insurance was a philanthropic institution for the benefit of all mankind. Yet that explanation did not explain to the policy holders here at home. They were not yet ready to extend the operations of the Golden Rule so far away from home.

As I see this matter, "our plain duty," so eloquently expounded by the chairman of the committee, is to our own people first, to the other fellow afterwards.

Mr. Chairman, a few words and I am through. We can all afford to be free traders, gentlemen, when the other fellow's industry is at stake and not our own. Our Democratic friends referred to by Mr. KEIFER this afternoon—the gentleman from Tennessee, who wanted his peanuts protected, and the gentleman from Virginia, or somewhere else, who wanted sumac protected—is a pretty good example of the Democratic policy of free trade, intermingled with the policy of protection "to our own industry;" but we can all afford to be free traders so long as it only affects the other fellow.

It is like Josh Billings's patriotism, when he stood ready to sacrifice all of his wife's relations to save the Union. But I warn you gentlemen that you can not pull one brick out of the wall without endangering the whole structure. You gentlemen in the East can not demand free wool and free hides and free sugar and expect the people of the West not to administer the same medicine in return. Sometimes, gentlemen, from a spirit of self-interest, we may be willing to sacrifice the industries of a far-off section of the country that we are not personally interested in in order to save certain things advocated by ourselves; but I can not see, gentlemen, how anyone on earth is to be benefited by the passage of this bill, except it be the men who control the sugar trust. Pass this bill and it will result in diminishing our own revenue, result in placing the sugar raised by Philippine sugar growers in competition with our own, and the ultimate result will be that the men who control the sugar trust will naturally find it to their interest to produce sugar there with the 15-cent labor of the Philippine Islands—I will not say enough sugar to supply this country, for I do not know—but certainly hundreds of thousands of tons of sugar to be brought in direct competition with that produced by the farmers of our own country.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I know that I sincerely want to be a loyal, patriotic American citizen. I have sometimes taken I trust pardonable pride in the fact that I had sprung from a line of American ancestors that traced their lineage into the very dawn of colonial history. I doubt not that since that May morning, nearly eight years ago, when Dewey's guns had forever silenced the Spanish power in Manila Bay until now, I have engaged in as vehement declaration against "hauling the flag down" as anyone here present.

I sincerely hope and trust that some of us may be unduly exercised over the result of this threatened legislation. I hope it is more of a threatened menace than a real one. Still, weighing my words carefully, I now assert that in the final event that this proposed legislation should prove the slow strangulation or prohibitive of the further development of that which I believe will become one of the great industries of the Republic and of such vital moment to that portion of the country that I immediately represent, then, in that event, rather than be loaded down with such an incubus, reserving the coal and naval stations necessary for the proper protection of our commercial and naval interests in the Orient, I would gladly see Old Glory come fluttering down from every flagstaff in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely, honestly, earnestly hope that the bill will not pass in its present form. [Applause.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a resolution for an investigation of the recent violent expulsion of an American mother from the White House offices and grounds by executive officials and employees while she was seeking an audience with the President of the United States. This resolution s inot privileged, and unless the Committee on Rules, to which is was referred, reports it I shall be powerless to secure its consideration. The incident which inspired this resolution recalled the darkest ages of the world. A lady of evident culture and refinement, an American mother, sought an audience with the President of the United States. She had every reason to feel that her cause would have just consideration from the man whose overwhelming popularity is largely due to his reverence of motherhood. She had every reason to believe that this sentiment would have been reflected in the conduct of the officials who surround him. Be this as it may, she had a right as an American citizen to seek redress of what she deemed a wrong, and if she was in error either as to the justice of her cause or as to the source from which relief might be obtained, she was entitled ot courteous information. She was told that she could not see the Presiednt. Thinking that perhaps the President for the moment was engaged, and not being familiar with the rules regarding visits to the President, she announced that she would wait.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the discussion of the resolution introduced and pending before the committee, and not reported, is hardly a proper subject at this time and not germane in any way to this question.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think it is germane to the bill, and I will tell the gentleman why. I object to this tariff which erects a Chinese wall around the White House as well as around the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While I favor as great an exportation of commodities as we can have, I object to the forcible exportation of American women who have personal business at the White House. Now, Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will let me proceed; I will not take up very much time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman think it a proper subject of discussion? I have made the suggestion; if he thinks it proper to arraign the President and his household, well let him go ahead.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What the country is arraigning is the spectacle of this woman's expulsion from the White House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have just made the suggestion to you.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the President had heard the growl of a bear or the howl of a wolf, he would have been on the scene immediately, but the wail of a woman fell on unresponsive ears.

Her ejectment was ordered and the indication of force overcame her sensitive temperament and naturally frightened her almost into hysteria. Then ensued an unequal struggle between this helpless and unoffending woman and powerful guards, in which she was barbarously handled. They dragged her across the muddy pavements, her clothing torn, her body bruised, and hurried her to the house of detention under an imputation of insanity, which was found to be so absurd that she was immediately released.

These unwarrantable and unnecessary brutalities demand investigation and merit censure. As for myself, the memory of my departed mother would not permit me to rest until I had given expression to my indignation. Unless Congress takes some action we will soon witness in a free republic a condition where citizens can not approach the President they have created without fear of bodily harm from arbitrary subordinates. In the name of American womanhood and American motherhood I protest against this outrageous action. It is a distinct lowering of the standards of American manhood. It is a violation of the sentiment that lies at the base of American civilization, American liberty, and American progress—the reverence of woman. Without this sentiment the Government is an empty pageantry and the flag a lie. The lady should have been permitted to remain. She would doubtless have left of her own volition if the situation had been politely and properly explained. The presence of an American mother honors any place, although it be the audience chamber of the President of the United States. [Applause.] When the President steps into the presence of an American mother he is before his superior. This action of his subordinates should be investigated. Sir, it is impossible in words to measure the sacredness of motherhood. It is the sweetest note in the great anthem the ages chant to God, and the radiance of His infinite mercy is reflected in a mother's smiles, a mother's tears, a mother's prayers, a mother's love.

A mother's love,
If there be one thing pure,
Where all else besides is sullied,
That can endure
When all things else have passed away,
If there be aught
Surpassing human deed, or word, or thought,
It is a mother's love.

[Applause.]

Not until the tired hands that supported the cares of infancy and ministered to the developing years have been folded forever, not until the tired eyes grown dim and weary with the anxious vigilance of countless hours and endless days and nights that seemed eternal have closed in pallid death do we begin to grasp the depth and tenderness of this mother love.

If Congress, composed of American fathers, nusbands, brothers, permits this incident to go unrebuked it will add a passive and cowardly approval of this violation of the most sacred principle of American life. [Applause.] The reverence of woman is the supreme mark of civilization. The ultimate destiny of the Republic is in her control, for the whispers of the mother become the thunders of the law. The world was ever happiest when woman was most free. In all the channels of human activity, in all the records of human martyrdom, self-sacrifice, and valor her example is unapproached by man. We need but mention the loyalty of Artemisia to the memory of Mausolus, the devotion of Margaret Roper to Sir Thomas More, the affection of Eleanor for Edward, the heroism of Lucy Hutchinson in the castle of Newark, the daring of Catherine Herman at the siege of Ostend, the fortitude of Lady Russell, the eloquence of Cornelia, the constancy of Madame Lavergne. The discovery of the American continent, on which have been wrought out the elemental problems of representative government, of practical science, and of every form of progress, the very existence of the American Republic, is due primarily to a woman.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the bill. I dislike to deprive the Democratic party of this new issue, but still I must insist that it is not germane to the discussion of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is raised, and if it is insisted on the Chair will have to rule upon it.

Mr. PAYNE. I insist upon it, or I should not have made it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion, and finds himself sustained by former rulings, that in Committee of the Whole House a Member must confine himself to the subject, but it has been universally held that in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a Member need not confine himself to the bill or subject under debate. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say that there are many rulings in that book to the contrary; that Members must confine themselves to the bill under discussion, whether in Committee of the Whole House or in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and it has been repeatedly so held.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not find any case in which a Member in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has been required in general debate to confine himself to the bill under discussion.

Mr. PAYNE. I have held that myself. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will add that, as may be found in paragraph 885 of the Parliamentary Precedents of the House, on February 23, 1849, the question was squarely before the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Chairman, Mr. Hugh White, of New York, "held that, according to the universal usage, when the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union all manner of matter was debated." An appeal was taken and the Chair was sustained. There has never been a contrary ruling from that time until the present day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Chair finds that according to paragraph 888, the House then being in Committee of the Whole House, not on the state of the Union, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] made a ruling that in that committee Members were confined to a discussion of the pending matter. It is, of course, so held in the House; but in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in general debate, under the unbroken precedents of the last fifty years or more, the ruling has been uniform that all manner of matter may be debated. Of course there are other ways in which a gentleman having the floor may violate rules and be out of order, but the Chair is unable to sustain the point as to germaneness. The point would be good in Committee of the Whole, but not in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union while general debate is in progress.

Mr. PAYNE. Under the ruling of the Chair, the Democratic party will have an opportunity to discuss the new issue they have discovered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But, Mr. Chairman, this is a nonpartisan question. My resolution provides for Republican and Democratic representatives upon the committee. I would favor a majority of Republicans upon that committee. Republicans are American citizens as well as Democrats. There is absolutely no division, for whether we are Democrats or Republicans we honor women.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman had as facts what he states in his speech, does he not think it would be better to present them in the police court than in the House of Representatives?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No, sir; a discussion of the dignity of the American woman is not out of place in the House of Representatives or anywhere else, and to suggest the police court is to cast a reflection upon the subject. I regret that the gentleman has endeavored to prevent a discussion of this character, a subject which we all meet with perfect unanimity.

I shall not say very much further on this subject. I said that the very existence of the American Republic was due primarily to a woman. If Isabella had not risked her personal fortune in support of the strange, almost fantastic, project of Columbus, no ships would have ever left the Spanish shore. And it is especially fitting that in a country which so largely owes its being and its progress to a woman's courage, the love of woman should signalize the sublimest attribute of its people. The mothers of the race should be the objects of its most unselfish devotion. They are the basis of the home; the support of industry; the hope of government; the crown of law. Their gentle ministrations have in every age uplifted honor, illumined life, sustained ambition, adorned success, and lightened sorrow. They give to society its surest guard; to progress its swiftest wing; to humanity its purest jewel. And the American mother is earth's highest type of purity and perfection. Above all the monarchs and titled dignitaries of all the courts of history I place the American mother, whose empire is the American home. Out of respect and reverence for her I trust that my resolution will be adopted. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to occupy a moment or two before yielding for the purpose of rising.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio give way for a moment until the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. GRANGER]?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I have welcomed the introduction of this bill and the discussion it has aroused, not so much from any results which I anticipate from its passage (for I am not sanguine that its results will be especially marked in the revival of commerce in the Philippines, any more than I fear the results upon any industry in America), but rather, sir, because I believe this bill is a substantial recognition of the duty this Government assumed when it seized the Philippine Islands, a duty none the less binding because the Supreme Court has decided that it is not an obligation. If it should lead, Mr. Chairman, to a strong and successful movement to sever the strictly artificial ties which bind us to those far-off islands, I should rejoice all the more. But I welcome the bill even more, Mr. Chairman, because it has given opportunity upon the floor of this House for a discussion of the tariff, a discussion which will not down, a discussion which only reflects the growing discontent which I believe exists among the people of this country with the present Dingley rates. I welcome it if for nothing else because it has resulted in the true statements on the Republican side of the House of the relative values of low-priced and high-priced labor. That of itself is worth all the time this House has spent on the bill.

Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed one moment more. I understand that while I was absent from the floor of the House to-day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] referred to the demand of the people of my State for free wool, and I also am told by my colleague from Rhode Island that he stated to the gentleman from Ohio that there was no demand for free wool in Rhode Island.

I understand that the gentleman spoke for his portion of Rhode Island. I wish to say here that there are two Members from Rhode Island on the floor of this House and that one of them has made a successful campaign twice in the State on the issue of free wool, so that there must be some demand for free wool in the State of Rhode Island.

This is a bill, Mr. Chairman, which, at least on its face, seems to be the result of that "aroused public conscience and higher sense of ethical conduct," the necessity for which was but recently urged upon us by the President. Our friends of the majority have been suddenly impressed that something must be done for the Philippines. They have, after five years of comparatively peaceful possession, during which time we have subjected our wards to a treatment differing only slightly from that accorded foreign nations—after five years, I say, of such possession they have discovered that as the islands are part and parcel of the territory of the United States it is inconsistent to treat them as though they were foreigners, and so it is proposed to take them around to the back door—not yet to the open front door, but to the back door, so to speak—to be given not the real position of children in the family, but just that of stepchildren, with a promise that if later on, after they have grown old enough and big enough and strong enough to support themselves and not be any expense to the mother, then the bars may all be taken down and they may be acknowledged as part and parcel of the family.

I was especially pleased, Mr. Chairman, at the reason given by the able and distinguished gentleman from New York as to why this step had not been taken before. It was, he said, because the little brown men "had not been good enough." "We postponed it until they got upon their good behavior," he said, as though the way to pacify a people struggling for their independence and to content them with the new rule was to deny them the application of a principle of government which he says has been admitted since the adoption of the Constitution. It might occur to some, Mr. Chairman, that a way to gain the confidence of a new people strange to our ways might have been to have shown them at once the advantage of being a part of the United States, and not to have violated one of the fundamental principles of the Government in our efforts to force our rule upon them. They had, alas for them, while suffering from the yoke of Spain, had their thoughts turned to the greatest instance in history of a great colonial uprising, and had studied so closely the history of the American war of independence that they also determined to be free and independent, and that they would not longer allow the rule of a country across the seas, although closely allied to them by ties of common speech, religion, and social intercourse. When they found, sir, that their hope was destroyed, that those to whom they had learned to look as the great example to liberty-loving people all over the world had themselves taken the place of the power they would overthrow, is it surprising that for a time the old struggle, the old aspiration, the old longing for liberty, remained? And even allowing for the moment (what I do not believe) that it was our duty to force our rule, the rule of a foreign state, upon them, yet does it seem really befitting a great nation, bent upon a great philanthropic duty, to punish such a people by denying them the only logical consistent treatment to which the position we had thrust upon them entitled them?

It was a curious anticlimax, Mr. Chairman, that a war entered into to free one struggling colony from the yoke of Spain should have resulted in placing the yoke of the liberator upon another struggling Spanish colony.

It will be readily recalled, Mr. Chairman, that a distinguished member of the late President McKinley's Cabinet referred to our exploitation of the Philippines as an opportunity for "philanthropy and 5 per cent to go hand in hand." Alas, Mr. Chairman, if we are to believe the report accompanying the bill and the evidence taken before the Ways and Means Committee and before the gentlemen who visited the Philippines last summer, 5 per cent and philanthropy have parted company, and there seems to be real reason to doubt whether they really ever reached the archipelago. According to the statement of the report upon this bill 3½ per cent is all that American capital can expect in those islands to-day, and American capital is not seeking investment at 3½ per cent 3,000 miles from home in a broken-down Asiatic colony.

I do not intend in the limited time at my disposal to-day to enter into any detailed description of the present condition in that island, but it is perhaps sufficient simply to refer to the glowing pictures which were painted of the opportunity for American enterprise when a United States official at Manila could write home (in 1898): "I hope for an influx this year of 10,000 ambitious young Americans, and all can live here well and become rich." Why, Mr. Chairman, those islands have become the graveyard of thousands of such hopes. It appears that from September, 1898, to May, 1904, a total of about 5,000 American individuals and firms were licensed to trade in Manila, and that to-day only about 750 remain. The mortality among these American business houses is not less than 80 per cent, and if we deduct the number engaged in the liquor traffic (183) and those whose business is entirely with soldiers and American civil officials the number becomes less than 500, an insignificant number.

It is admitted on all hands that the condition of these islands is indeed pitiable to-day. Mr. McLeod, representing the Manila Chamber of Commerce, described last summer the commerce of the islands as in a state of collapse. "The worst crisis ever known in the annals of Philippine history," Mr. McLeod describes it. The devastation of a long-drawn-out and bloody war left ruined fields and villages and deprived the islands of thousands of men in the very prime of life who were needed to build up what our policy of beneficent assimilation had destroyed. The war had been followed, as is so often the case, by years of bad crops and by dire disease. The beasts of burden so humorously described by the gentleman from New York had been destroyed not only by disease, but as a war measure by our troops; fields had lain fallow; machinery, rude and crude at the best, had been even more unfitted for use by months of idleness, until at length even the apathy of the majority of the House is awakened and a remedy is sought. It is, they say, to be found in the bill now before the House.

The report of the committee and the opening address of its distinguished chairman recite the views with which we are familiar from the papers and testimony of Secretary Taft; views which the committee adopted and, partially at least, proposes to put into operation. We are not ready, say the majority of the committee, to give the islands free trade with the United States, but we will let down the bars partially, trusting that during the next three years the financial condition of the islands will sufficiently improve to allow of absolute free trade by 1909. Let us look for a few moments, Mr. Chairman, at this gift to the Filipino. The old adage that a gift horse must not be looked in the mouth does not apply to the giver. We are anxious, so we say, to enlarge the market for Philippine sugar and tobacco. It is conceded that it is sorely needed. With this end in view the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means propose to reduce the Dingley tariff rates on sugar and tobacco by 75 per cent, but conscious, as they are, that any attempt to touch the Dingley rates (save to raise them) will result in strong opposition from their own side they say, in effect, "But do not be disturbed; this reduction is simply for appearance only. It can not affect any industry in the United States, because the import of neither of these products will be increased by this change." Why, the gentleman from New York, in his opening remarks, says, with characteristic frankness:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, what will be the effect of the passage of this bill * * * upon the sugar industry in the Philippine Islands? I do not believe that it is going to give them a market in the United States. I do not believe it is relief enough to help them here; at least I am very much in doubt about it.

He goes on to prove, and does prove very satisfactorily, I believe, that Philippine sugar can not be put down in New York in competition with that of our own growth and that of Cuba, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. No help, then, is to be expected to the Philippines from this quarter, because there will be no market for it; but the gentleman sagely and wisely remarks, following the report of the committee, that it will stimulate the market in China and Japan. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the testimony taken last summer before the Members of the House, it was stated that while China and Japan would purchase Philippine sugar, yet so long as there was no market for it in the United States and while there was no real demand for it elsewhere the merchants of China could practically fix the price of the Philippine product, and that they did so, to the great loss of the Philippine producer.

And now, Mr. Chairman, our friends propose to stimulate their eastern market; they propose to stimulate the price in China. How? By pretending to create a market for Philippine sugar here in America, while in reality there is to be no market. And the simple-minded Chinese merchant is to be so impressed by this new market that he will at once raise his bid for Philippine sugar. It is a pretty scheme, is it not, Mr. Chairman? And those who know at all the astute Chinese merchant will not wonder how it will work. The report and the claims of the committee for the bill in their efforts to allay alarm prove too much. If the effects of the bill are as inappreciable as claimed, it will do no good. It is a gold brick, Mr. Chairman, intended to allay the suspicions which have been aroused, the discontent which is growing over our indefinite and costly and unsuccessful occupation of those islands. It is a pure case of Buncombe, of a promise made of none effect, of a mountain laboring and bringing forth a mouse.

The bill which the minority of the committee will present as an amendment to this bill will not, in my opinion, do much more for the islands than the one under consideration, but it has the great advantage that it squarely faces the issue; that it will, if adopted, put an end to our farcical colonial policy by which we differentiate between our insular possessions, and make fish of one and fowl of another. It puts the Philippines in the same class as Hawaii and Porto Rico. It ceases to treat them as foreign territory while at the same time insisting that they are under our flag for an indefinite period of time.

The only argument urged by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means against taking down the tariff bars between the United States and the Philippine Islands and treating them as we do our other insular possessions—Hawaii and Porto Rico—is the loss of revenue to the insular government from the repeal of the import duty on goods taken into the islands, an amount at the most not to exceed $1,400,000 a year for the next three years. That sum, however, I believe to be largely excessive. The import duties from Spain into the islands amount to about $600,000 a year, and it is argued that under article 4 of the treaty of Paris, by which it was agreed that "the United States will for the term of ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States," would in the event of the repeal of all duties between the United States and the islands, in each direction, admit ipso facto all Spanish goods free of duty. But, Mr. Chairman, this position can not be maintained by Spain unless she also gives to the products of the islands the same free entrance that the United States will give under the substitute bill. The admission of American merchandise into the Philippines would be accompanied by an admission of Philippine merchandise free of duty into the United States, and to entitle Spain to the admission of her goods free in the islands she must adopt the "same terms" as those on which the goods of the United States are admitted—that is, a free interchange on both sides. If it is argued that Spain would do this, it is only necessary to point out that Spain is tied up by treaty with nearly every country of Europe by the "most favored nation" clause, and could not take this step without granting equal privilege to every other nation.

We have, then, nothing to fear from loss of import duties on Spanish goods, and the estimated loss is therefore reduced to $800,000, but this can not be estimated as a yearly deficit of that amount in the island revenues. If the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is correct in his statement, the income of the internal revenues of the islands is increasing at such a rate that at the expiration of the next three years it will be equal to the import duties now received from the United States and Spain; that is, some $1,400,000 per annum. If the islands continue to receive, sir, the duties on Spanish goods, the deficit will not be three times the amount received from the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, is it not possible that the result of this loss of revenue from imports into the islands from the United States may be some economy in the cost of the administration of the government we have set up in the Philippines? We talk so much of the benefit of American rule in the islands, of the schools we have established, of the harbor we have created in the port of Manila, of the roads we have built, of the buildings we have erected for housing our officials that we are apt to lose sight of the fact that all this has been paid for by the Filipinos themselves out of their own diminished funds, and that it includes the entire salary list of the American officials, of whom four alone receive a sum aggregating $65,500 per annum.

I don't think I exaggerate when I say that the administration of the Philippine Islands, under rule of the United States, is the most costly colonial government in existence. Mr. McLeod, in his testimony before the visiting Congressmen last summer, stated that the salary list of the islands to-day is greater than the entire Spanish budget for the last year of Spain's rule. But I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement in regard to the expenses made by a man familiar for many years with the cost of colonial government, and I read from Ireland's The Far Eastern Tropics (p. 226):

> With an export trade of $32,000,000, the Philippine Islands are called upon to pay $12,500,000 for the expense of the insular government; in other words, every $100 worth of produce exported from the islands costs the General Government $40. If to this we add $2,500,000 collected in the islands for municipal and provincial government, the ratio of expenditure on Government account to value of exports is raised to 46 per cent.
> That a country should have to pay 46 per cent of the value of its total industrial product, excluding a comparatively insignificant internal trade in local produce, for the privilege of being governed, is obviously absurd; and although a dependent tropical government is always expensive, from the fact that the administration is very much better than could arise naturally as a product of native activity, that of the Philippines is much more expensive than it should be.
> Comparing the cost of government, on the basis adopted above, with that of five British dependencies in various parts of the Tropics—Ceylon, Barbados, British Guiana, Trinidad, and the Federated Malay States—the average is 27 per cent, as against 46 per cent in the Philippines.

Secretary Taft, in his speech at Montpelier, Vt., August 26, 1904, said:

> Judge Parker, the candidate of the party, falls into the error of saying that the Philippines cost us $650,000,000, when by no possible calculation can their cost be made to exceed $250,000,000 down to the present time.

Secretary Taft thus admits the expenditure upon the Philippine Islands for the five years previous to the date of his utterance was about $50,000,000 per annum. Judge Parker charges that the expenditure was about $130,000,000 per annum. Secretary Taft nor Judge Parker give itemized statements of account. It is fair to say, then, that the expense of the Philippine Islands to the United States lies between $50,000,000 and $130,000,000 per annum, or an average of about $75,000,000 per annum. During that time, according to the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs for 1904, the insular revenues, amounting to about $65,000,000, were also expended. The insular revenues and expenditures seem to be an unknown quantity in this argument. Mr. PAYNE states that the revenue can not stand free trade for tobacco and sugar, but he does not state what the revenues are. The Report of the Philippine Commission, three immense volumes, two-thirds of which is made up of entirely useless matter, does not state them. The only itemized statement that I have been able to find is the report of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, above referred to, for the five years—1899 to 1904. The total expenditures are there placed at about $60,000,000, or about $12,000,000 per annum. This excludes the expense of the Army of the United States; also the insular salary and expense fund to cover the cost of transportation to Manila, which, according to the report referred to, amounted to $63,555. Nor does it include the bond issues authorized for railroads and for the purchase of the friar lands.

We have tried the impossible, Mr. Chairman; we have tried to "hurry the East;" we have tried to turn into "hustling" Yankees an oriental race that had for three centuries been under the molding hand of the slowest, most conservative country in Europe. Let our Commission go a little slowly out there; let them set their own house in order and cease to pay to Americans brought there with no knowledge of the islands or familiarity with eastern colonial methods salaries three times those paid to educated Filipinos for the same work; let them cease to strive to make the little Filipinos cry for "flannel petticoats and moral pocket handkerchiefs," and perhaps they may be able to run the islands somewhere near what it costs Great Britain for similar work, and then there would be no deficit from loss of import duties.

But, Mr. Chairman, even if the minority bill is rejected, as I presume it will be, yet, sir, I shall support the present bill, as a recognition of the right position which the country should assume toward these islands and so long as we shall continue to hold them. God grant that the day may come when we shall recognize for them the same rights which we so long ago demanded successfully for ourselves against the very same argument of unfitness for self-government which we now hear from the other side. I believe, sir, that the people of this country are coming to the conclusion which I saw the other day had been reached by Commissioner Schurman, that "a bad government of the islands by the Filipinos is better than a good government of them by anyone else," because, sir, I believe that is true of every people. I believe that self-government can only be worked out by letting a people govern themselves. But I do not believe, sir, that it is necessary that there should be bad government in the Philippines. I believe that the resolution introduced by my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], as well as the one introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], points the way to a stable form of self-government of the Philippine Islands by the Filipinos, and the relief of the United States from this "Old Man of the Sea" burden, which has been from the beginning a source of financial loss which we shall never make good, a constant menace to our security at home, as the defense of the islands in case of war would hopelessly divide our Navy; but, more than all, Mr. Chairman, a standing contradiction of the fundamental principle on which our country rests, the inherent right of self-government.

Such a change of sentiment is not too much to express. Changes of sentiment are coming somewhat quickly nowadays. I confess, sir, that I never expected to hear from the leader on the other side of the House a frank avowal of the Democratic doctrine that low-priced labor is not necessarily cheap labor; that labor is cheap or dear depends entirely upon what it can produce. Why, Mr. Chairman, that has been Democratic doctrine from the beginning; it has been enunciated from this side of the House for more years than any man in it has lived. The lowest priced labor is generally the dearest. And now, Mr. Chairman, the day has come when the leader of the Republican majority of the House stands at his place and says:

> They talk about cheap labor. Why, labor is worth what it will do; what it is sufficient for.

And then he goes on to state what no Democrat will deny, that dollar a day labor in Louisiana or two-dollar a day labor in Michigan will produce more and is therefore cheaper than 30 cents a day labor in the Philippines. It is what we have all been contending for on this side of the House when you have talked about bringing American labor into competition with the "pauper labor" of Europe. We have told you that American labor is worth more, because the American laborer is more intelligent, more industrious, more ambitious, takes more readily to new ideas and new methods, and can therefore produce more, and that higher wages paid to him are cheaper than lower wages paid abroad. We welcome the gentleman from New York to the ranks of the tariff reformers. But, Mr. Chairman, not only from the gentleman from New York, but from other gentlemen on the other side we have heard good Democratic doctrine. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in speaking of the special legislation for the beet-sugar people of Colorado and Michigan and a few other States, speaks of it as a "charity." It is a charity, Mr. Chairman, if that can be charity which consists of taking from the pockets of the whole people and bestowing it upon a few, but it is the foundation principle of the ultraprotection policy to which the Republican party stands committed, and the result is exactly as the gentleman from Illinois stated. You give it as a "charity" for temporary use and the recipients soon call it a right and can not find language strong enough to denounce you when you insist upon some rights for the rest of the people. That is good Democratic doctrine, Mr. Chairman, and we welcome it wherever it comes from. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in one sentence that I am glad for the first time to learn that my colleague from Rhode Island has made a campaign with free wool for an issue. Nobody in Rhode Island ever heard of it before. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I was not unaware of the rules of the House applicable to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when I made the point of order, which I did not press, against the course that the young gentleman from Texas was taking. But I did it, and made the point of order, for the purpose of calling his attention in a sort of mild and fatherly kind of a protest against the course that he was taking, thinking and hoping that in his own interests he would waive any further denunciation of the President and permit the women of the world, made notorious and famous and delightful in history, song, and poetry, to have stood on the laurels that they have already won until a future day.

The gentleman from Texas has introduced a resolution into this House demanding an investigation of the unfortunate affair that is said to have occurred at the office of the White House, and that resolution is pending before the proper committee of the House. It asks for the facts in the case, and I had supposed that upon the mere suggestion the gentleman would have seen fit to wait for the facts until that resolution could be brought into the House and properly acted upon, if it ever is acted upon, and then the facts be developed.

In this connection I am going to say that I know of no difference between the propriety of conduct in the management of the President's office and the President's house and that of the humblest citizen of the District of Columbia. I do not believe that the American Congress is a police court or has anything to do with the question of disorderly conduct of any attaché or employee that may be in the neighborhood of the White House. I do not believe that any condition has arisen where the husband of this woman can not take the proper steps to vindicate her. I am not one of those who believe that a sensation should be sent abroad to the world denouncing and assailing the honor and integrity and character of the American administration of government by any haphazard remarks of this character.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for your consideration, certain papers which should have accompanied my message of January 8, 1906, but which were omitted on account of delay in printing.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1906.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RIXEY was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of James Downs, Forty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made there on.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Postmaster-General submitting a revised estimate of appropriation for the postal service—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CLAPP presented a petition of the legislature of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation opening to homestead settlement lands in the Chippewa Indian Reservation in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas, by an act of Congress introduced by our Senator NELSON, entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians," a treaty was made with said Indians whereby they were to select lands for homes and the remainder of their reservations were to be opened for actual settlers, at $1.25 per acre and five years' residence, the timber being first sold, which has been done; and

Whereas by subsequent legislation 225,000 acres of said cut-over lands were reserved for experiment in forestry, without compensation to the Indians; and

Whereas such lands surround the allotments taken by the Indians and render them valueless, thus defeating the purposes of the Nelson Act, which was to help them, educate them, and make them self-supporting. Land without roads, schools, churches, and towns, and no way to get them, is worthless; and

Whereas the State owns about 145,000 acres of land located within said tract, which is depreciated in value for the same reasons; and

Whereas the reservation of so much land fit for settlement is an injury, not only to that part of the State, but to the commercial interests of the whole State, the land reserved being already crossed by two railroads: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is requested to enact a law to open said lands to settlement by actual settlers, conformably to the Nelson Act.

Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives are requested to urge this matter upon Congress.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state is instructed to send copies of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives and to the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there concurrent or other resolutions? [A pause.] If not, the morning business is closed.

NATIONAL BOARD OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that some Senators have indicated a desire to address the Senate on the measure under consideration yesterday, known as the "pure-food bill," I shall not ask at this time that that measure be taken up. I desire to call up from the table Senate bill 2398 and submit a few remarks before the bill goes to the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the title of the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2398) to create the National Board of Corporations and to provide for the regulation thereby of corporations engaged in interstate, territorial, district, or insular possession business.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, when a surgeon contemplates the performance of an operation that may jeopardize the life of the patient, the first thing to be done is to secure and determine the proper conditions surrounding the operation and the patient. The Senate has been proposing through measures that have been submitted to it to deal with the question of fixing the rates of transportation upon railroads and other public carriers. It seems to me that before entering upon that great question we should determine the status of the corporations which are to be the subject of the legislation. I have therefore prepared, and propose to ask for its reference to the proper committee after making some remarks upon it, a bill directed to that subject. The basis of proper and fair charges for transportation must always be considered in the light of the relation which the carrier bears to the investment, to the expense incurred, and to the business relation between it and those with whom it is to do business.

Under conditions that have long existed, corporations have paid but little attention to this question, and they are not now in a condition of business health to enable them to deal with themselves or to enable us to deal with them in determining the question. Before we take hold of this patient and lay it upon the table for the purpose of adjusting its difficulties we must know that it is in good business health. We want to know, first, upon what the corporation is based.

If it is based upon a proposition to do business without capital we want to know that, because corporations may have assets other than property assets. Their assets may consist in the performance of a duty that does not involve the ownership of property. Another class of corporations may count as their assets the fixed, substantial investment in property that is entitled, under the recognized law of right and justice, to the privilege of earning a fair remuneration to those who have made the investment.

Mr. President, the bill which I have introduced and which is now upon the table provides, first, for the creation of a tribunal within the existing Government which shall supervise and determine the status of the corporations. It proposes to exercise no control over them other than such control as is necessary to enable them to determine those facts.

I provides, in substance, that no corporation shall engage in interstate business except it pass the scrutiny of a board of corporations, that board to consist of five members under and within the jurisdiction, primarily, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, four of the members of the board to be appointed by the President and their appointment to be ratified by the Senate, and the fifth member to be the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. It provides that this board shall be authorized to inquire into the business status of all corporations engaging in interstate business, for the purpose of determining the character of the corporation, the nature of the business that it proposes to engage in, and the relation which the capital of that corporation or the capitalization of it bears to its assets.

It also provides that the corporations engaged in such business shall not engage in certain other business. For instance, it provides that corporations engaged as common carriers shall not be the owners of coal mines or other public utilities except to the extent of their own necessities; that they shall not control these public utilities in competition with private ownership or other ownership than that of the transportation company.

The wisdom of that restriction was apparent only a few years since in the great coal strike. It is apparent every day in the States upon the Pacific coast, where certain railroad companies own large areas of coal lands and will not, under any circumstances, make freight rates to any other owners of coal lands that would enable them to compete with the business of the railroads or those interested in the railroad companies as dealers in coal.

This bill provides also for the segregation of the common carrier from industrial pursuits which would enable the common carrier to control the market as against private enterprise and investment.

Of course it contains something of the element of restriction as to the scope of business in which a corporation may engage, but under existing conditions it has become absolutely necessary that the common carriers of the country should confine their operations and their control to the business for which they were primarily organized, and that they should not be allowed, through the great financial combinations that are represented by common carriers, to become practically the exclusive owners of public utilities.

It has been suggested that you can not restrain the right of individuals to engage in as many different kinds of business as they may like. That is true. But we can place the condition of restraint upon any corporation, which is an artificial person, doing business of an interstate character. We can place any restriction upon it we may see fit, because the Constitution has given us that right in express terms.

This bill provides also that insurance companies shall be insurance companies and nothing else; that they shall not be a combination of insurance companies, banks, trust companies, railroad owners, and coal miners, because the very nature of life insurance especially is such as to constitute those who represent the insured trustees of a most sacred trust.

While it is true that under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Paul v. Virginia and other cases that have reaffirmed that doctrine the insurance business is not and can not be held to be interstate commerce, this bill by its provisions does not undertake to control the business of insurance as interstate commerce, but it does undertake to say that an insurance company that does not come to the board of corporations with a clean bill of health, according to the restrictions of this measure, shall not be entitled to the use of the mails of the United States.

Whether that will be a complete remedy or not, whether that will solve the difficulty or not, is to be determined. It will at least be one step in that direction, and I am inclined to believe that the insurance companies will purge themselves of the objectionable features which have been urged against them rather than be debarred from the use of the United States mails.

As is expressed in this bill, I do not believe that in the insurance business those in whose hands this trust rests should be engaged in the use of the money of the insured paid into the treasury in the shape of premiums for the purpose of banking, of maintaining trust companies, back-door loaning institutions, or any other enterprise that results in such conditions as have been disclosed by the investigation recently carried on in the State of New York. I believe the insurance companies should exist as insurance companies pure and simple; that they should be regulated and governed by such rules and such restrictions as, while maintaining an ample margin to meet every possible business emergency, would prevent them from indulging in speculation, from coming to the assistance of desperate speculators and manipulators of the stock markets, and would prevent them from becoming partners in financial deals in Wall street or elsewhere.

The institution commonly known as "Wall street," which is simply a gambling club over on the Hudson River, has assumed the right to dictate the financial policy of this country. Whenever the legislation, either enacted or proposed, does not suit them they meet us with a threat that "unless you do certain things within a certain time and enact certain legislation we will wreck the country financially." Fortunately the time when they can carry out that threat has passed for this country, but there was a time when they were able to do it. It is just possible that conditions might arise under which they could do it again. I do not believe that they will; but they remind me, in the threat that was issued a few days since and is still being discussed daily in the press, of the small boy I knew when I was a small boy. When his mother would punish him his only deterrent was to shout, "I will tear my coat! I will tear my coat!" So we have it from Wall street that "if you do not legislate so as to make the currency of the country more flexible, according to our ideas and along the lines which we suggest, we will bring a panic upon this country."

First, they have sought to control, and in a large measure have succeeded in controlling, through the financial combinations to which I have referred, an unnatural and unholy proportion of the money of the country. They have collected together money by hundreds of millions of dollars, and by the little combination of a coterie of men whose only responsibility in life is to gamble upon the chance of what somebody else may do, they can bring about what is known as "a stress in the money market;" they can make a threat of ruin to the country that will affect the prosperity of the citizens from one ocean to the other.

That condition should not exist. It exists in a measure because of the very evils against which this bill is directed—inflated values, fictitious capitalization based upon small property or none—that enable them to give a fictitious value to a debenture or a stock and send it upon the market and by the process of juggling keep it in the air as a juggler keeps in the air a light ball when balanced upon the ends of his fingers.

Those are the conditions against which this bill is directed; and I say while it undertakes to provide a remedy for the overcapitalization of corporations, while it undertakes to provide that no corporation shall engage in interstate business except that it shall pass through this board of corporations and obtain a clean bill of financial health, and that until they have the license which that board is authorized to give them they may not engage in interstate commerce at all, it does not undertake to prescribe the same restrictions for insurance companies for the reasons I have already stated—that insurance is not and can not be interstate commerce; but it can say that an insurance company which upon its face is not or does not show that it is free from the restrictions of the bill and which can not satisfy the board that it has complied with the provisions of the bill shall not use the mails of the United States.

The bill provides that a corporation, before it can receive a license to do an interstate business, shall show to the satisfaction of the board that it has not entered into a combination for the purpose of securing rebates; that it has not entered into a pooling arrangement which would amount to a trust to the detriment of the people. Whatever kind of a corporation it may be, it must show those things. It must show that its capitalization is proportionate to its property holdings. It must show that it is solvent. When it does, it will have no difficulty in receiving a license to do business as a corporation doing interstate business. But until it does that it can not do interstate business.

The bill provides that if any corporation shall refuse or fail to comply with the provisions which give it a legal and proper standing it may be treated as a bankrupt and a derelict in the business world, and that its business may be wound up as the courts wind up the business of a bankrupt concern. That is the method of dealing with them.

I do not desire to enter into any more extended consideration of this bill at this time. I commend it to the wisdom and consideration of the committee to which it will naturally go. I desired, as I sent it out of this body, to speak these few words on its behalf, as I may or may not have another opportunity of discussing the measure; but I am quite sure that the committee to which the bill will be referred will give it the respectful consideration to which it is entitled. With that statement I ask, unless some other Senator desires to say something about the bill, that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be so referred, in the absence of objection.

SABINE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, on yesterday I made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 2159) authorizing the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Texas and Louisiana, had been passed, in order that I might hear some interested parties as to the effect on the bill of certain Senate amendments. Having received a satisfactory reply from those parties, I now withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas withdraws the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill named by him was passed. The bill, therefore, stands passed.

BUREAU OF INSURANCE.

Mr. SPOONER. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move that the Interstate Commerce Committee, to whom was referred Senate bill 173, be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I was about to explain the purpose of the bill. It is a bill to establish a bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor, to be called the "Bureau of Insurance," with the usual elaborations of such measures. I do not want to discuss the subject. The consideration of its constitutionality has been submitted heretofore by the Senate to the Judiciary Committee, and all bills upon that subject are desired to be referred to that committee, until it shall have reported on the question of constitutional law involved.

Mr. ALDRICH. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce is absent, but I assume that that committee will have no objection to being discharged from the consideration of the bill, as the subject-matter has been referred by the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPOONER. I am much obliged to the Senator from Rhode Island for his suggestion, but I have no doubt that the Senate, having ordered this reference, would complete it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 173) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor," approved February 14, 1903, being chapter 552 of the United States Statutes, enacted by the Fifty-seventh Congress, be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as there does not seem to be any very pressing business now pending, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate, simply to enable me to offer some amendments to the bill, which I am instructed to offer by the Committee on Commerce, with a view to having the bill reprinted after the amendments shall have been adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit the Chair first to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for your consideration certain papers which should have accompanied my message of January 8, 1906, but which were omitted on account of delay in printing.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to inquire of the Chair what is the character of the papers referred to in the message? I think the RECORD ought to show something in regard to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message is accompanied by a letter of the Secretary of War to the President concerning charges against the Isthmian Canal Commission contained in an article in the Independent, a weekly publication. The message of the President, with the letter of the Secretary of War, will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, in the absence of objection.

Mr. ALLISON. And be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I will renew the request I made a few moments ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before that is done I desire to inquire whether the article written by Mr. Bigelow, printed in the Independent, is included in the letter of the Secretary of War, to which article his letter is a reply?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The document is quite extensive, but the Chair is informed that the article to which the Senator refers is not included.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask, then, Mr. President, that the article entitled "Our mismanagement at Panama," written by Mr. Poultney Bigelow, and published in the Independent between pages 9 and 21, inclusive, be also printed as a Senate document to accompany the letter of the Secretary of War.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas requests that the article published in the Independent, entitled "Our Mismanagement at Panama, by Poultney Bigelow, M. A.," be printed as a public document. Is there objection?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether there is any communication from the President or from the Secretary of War which specifically mentions this article? We certainly can not undertake to print as public documents all the sensational literature which is being issued because somebody happens to be mentioned. I do not know whether either the Secretary of War or the President has specifically mentioned the article referred to. I hope they have not; but if they have I suppose the Senator from Texas would have the right to have the article referred to printed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator deny that the Secretary of War covers the article specifically?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know anything about it. I have not enough familiarity with it to know whether he does or not.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no question that he does.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter which accompanies the President's message does refer to the article mentioned by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well, then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand that there is now upon the Vice-President's desk a communication from the Secretary of War, which should have come in with the message, but was delayed, which covers the point made in the article referred to, if I am correctly informed. I therefore suggest that the article and the reply of the Secretary of War be printed together.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is precisely my request, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. The report of the Secretary of War has not yet been laid before the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, it has been.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I had not noticed that.

Mr. CULBERSON. My request is precisely that which has just been made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not so understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter of the Secretary of War was laid before the Senate in connection with the message of the President of the United States. Without objection, the article mentioned by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] will be printed as a public document.

Mr. CULBERSON. Together with the answer of the Secretary of War.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In connection with the answer of the Secretary of War. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

Mr. TELLER. I want to make an inquiry. Some days ago we received from the President a message, which was published in the RECORD. It has always been customary to have messages of that kind also published as a document. I have made inquiry several times, but up to the present I am informed that it has not been published. I should like to inquire of some Senator regarding that.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator refer to the Panama message?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. LODGE. It is the first thing in this volume [exhibiting], which is on the desks of Senators.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will say that it has been the custom to print such a message as a separate document, and I think the practice to which I have referred ought to be continued.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think such messages have always been printed separately.

Mr. TELLER. I want to inquire of some Senator if that usage, which has prevailed ever since I have been here, has been dropped; and if so, whether it is accidental or intentional? It is not sufficient to publish a message from the President in some other document. It should also be published, I think, in justice to the Executive, in the manner that such messages have always been published.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that this whole volume [exhibiting], as I understand, constitutes the President's message. The message proper is in the front of the volume, and the other papers follow after it as exhibits to that message.

Mr. HALE. That is the very point that I was going to suggest. All the papers that go with the message are published with it and make the document. I do not think the custom has been to publish the message alone, separate and distinct from the papers that accompany it, but they make really, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has said, one document, and that is, as I suppose, this document on our desks.

Mr. TELLER. This is not such a document as is usually published. This is the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission for the year ending December 1, 1905. Of course, there are some things contained in the document besides the report.

This is not very material, Mr. President, except that it has always been the custom to publish the message in the way I have indicated, so that if one wants to look at the message he can get it at the document room and can examine it. These messages should be published just as we publish the annual message of the President. I think the old practice ought to be continued. I know the message is included in this document which I have on my table, but I do not want every time I desire to examine a message, whether it be the annual message of the President or a special message, to have to consult such a large document as this. Of course, this is a matter of no great consequence, but this is certainly a departure from the usual custom.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask what is the order of business, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid before the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Before that is done I desire to submit a point of order to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

AFFAIRS OF MOROCCO.

Mr. BACON. I rise, Mr. President, as a matter of order, to make the point of order that the resolution introduced by me and which was before the Senate on the day before yesterday, requesting certain information from the President of the United States relative to the appointment of delegates to the Moroccan conference is the business now in order. Unless the presiding officer is prepared to rule that the point is well taken, I desire to be heard briefly in support of the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator kindly state just what is his point of order?

Mr. BACON. The point of order is that the resolution introduced by myself asking for certain information from the President of the United States relative to the appointment of delegates to the conference to consider Moroccan affairs is now in order. That is my point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Under what rule?

Mr. BACON. I am going on to state it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LODGE. I merely want to say on the point of order——

Mr. BACON. I desire to say something myself on the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that the resolution can not be taken up except by motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hold that the resolution of the Senator from Georgia is upon the Calendar and can only be taken up on motion or by unanimous consent.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Chair not to so rule until I can have the opportunity to present my reasons in support of the point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the learned and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] makes the point of order upon the point of order that the resolution can only be taken up on motion. The Senator may be correct, but, if so, it is not in accordance with the view which I have heretofore taken as to the right of a Senator to make a point of order. A point of order is a matter of the highest privilege, and can be made at any time, without motion, upon the initiative of a single Senator; and it is then for the Senate to determine, or for the presiding officer to determine, whether the point of order is well taken.

There is, Mr. President, no rule, so far as I have been able to find, to the effect that when a resolution has once been taken up by the Senate, if it is not disposed of on that day, it shall go to the Calendar. If there is any rule to that effect I have, after diligent search, been unable to find it, and I find upon inquiry of the officers of the Senate, more familiar with the rules than I am, that it is true, so far as their knowledge goes, that there is no rule which sends a resolution to the Calendar after it has been once before the Senate. As a result of the best investigation that I have been able to give it, that is simply a matter of practice and not a matter of rule. The rule, Mr. President, with reference to resolutions, is found on page 14 of the Rules of the Senate; and without reading all of that rule, which is divided into 5 separate paragraphs, I will read only the first and the last.

1. Whenever a bill or joint resolution shall be offered, its introduction shall, if objected to, be postponed for one day. (Jefferson's Manual, sec. 23.)

That refers to the introduction, but it has no relation to this particular resolution, because it was introduced without objection.

Then, as to the disposition of such a resolution, the fifth paragraph of Rule XIV is probably the one which will have more direct application. That paragraph reads:

5. All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct. (Jefferson's Manual, sec. 25.)

That was the course taken in reference to this resolution. Upon the second day, in accordance with the contemplation of that rule, the resolution was called up for action.

Now, Mr. President, in the absence of a rule, we have been proceeding under what is recognized as a practice, which is that when a resolution has been taken up and has been under discussion and consideration by the Senate, it shall thereafter go to the Calendar upon the conclusion of that day's proceedings in the morning hour.

Now, sir, the proposition which I make in connection with my point of order is this: That there is no rule, in the first place, as already stated, which would carry the resolution to the Calendar, and, in the second place, that, according to the principle of the practice, recognizing the practice as a correct one, the resolution does not legitimately go to the Calendar under the circumstances of this case. In order to properly present that suggestion, it is necessary to advert to the object of the practice in order to see whether or not, under the principle which actuates such object, this resolution has properly gone to the Calendar, or whether it is now properly before the Senate, or in a position to be before the Senate for consideration in the morning hour.

The evident object of the practice which has grown up of considering resolutions in the morning hour—there is no rule which says that a resolution shall be considered in the morning hour, so far as I can find—the evident object of it is to give opportunity for freedom of debate, for freedom for the consideration of any matter of importance which may be so considered by any one Senator, and not that, before he shall be allowed to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate and present it for the consideration not only of the Senate but for the information and consideration of the public, he shall have to depend upon the acquiescence and the consent of a majority of the body. The object of debate, and free debate, in the Senate is not simply to affect the action of Senators, but to let the people of the country know what is being done by officers of the Government in carrying on the affairs of the Government.

Mr. President, it is one of the most important and valuable and distinguishing features of this body as a deliberative body that whereas in other deliberative bodies it is frequently found, if it not the general rule, that consideration of any matter can only be had by the consent of the presiding officer or of the majority of the body, in this body this distinguishing and important feature gives a Senator an opportunity to be heard upon any question he deems of importance, even though there be no other single Senator in the body who agrees with him in that particular. And this is a right not only of the Senator, but one in which the public has a most valuable interest. In order that that may not be abused, in order that there may not be the consumption of too much time by any one Senator in the presentation of a matter which might be deemed by him important, while there might not be a concurrence of others with him in that particular, the practice has grown up of limiting the consideration of these matters to the first morning hour after the time it was taken up. But the great distinguishing feature of the principle and the reason of the practice remains, that there shall be opportunity for the presentation of the subject-matter and its discussion, although for the reason stated there is in the practice this limitation upon it. And any procedure by which this right to discussion of a resolution is denied or practically destroyed is a violation of the spirit and intent of the rule. If a procedure is allowed by which, when anyone is not willing to have his acts or some other person's acts discussed, the Senate can be put behind closed doors and the time taken up with discussing the question of secrecy, then the right of freedom of debate and freedom of official criticism is entirely destroyed in the Senate except by the permission of the majority.

Mr. HALE. Now, let me ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I believe I see what the Senator has in mind, that a single Senator shall have the right to present his views in his own way, without being taken from the floor by a majority.

Mr. BACON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. HALE. Well, does the Senator think that that privilege of a single Senator to introduce a resolution and to speak upon it should be indefinite and without limitation, and that every morning hour, as it comes around, should be taken by the Senator who has introduced a resolution, and thereby occupy all the time of morning hour after morning hour, and thus confiscate the morning hour for weeks or months?

The rule—I will not say the rule, for the Senator is right about it; it is the practice—the object, end, and aim of the practice is that the Senator shall have his day in court. His resolution goes over on objection. The next day he has an hour and can discuss it, and then the invariable practice—and I do not know how we could do business without that practice—is that it shall go to the Calendar and be subject to the majority of the Senate. Otherwise—I do not want to repeat myself—day after day and week after week one Senator would occupy the morning hour and confiscate it. Does the Senator from Georgia think one Senator ought to have the right to do that?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator has concluded, I will answer his question.

Mr. HALE. I have.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, no one in this Chamber is better capacitated to offer an opinion which could safely be followed as a guide by the Senate than the honorable Senator from Maine, who, by his long experience here, his diligent attention to business, and his well-recognized ability has acquired a familiarity with our proceedings, and has a discriminating judgment, which lead him to correct conclusions; but, unfortunately, the Senator from Maine anticipated me before I had stated my proposition. He assumed that I intended to state a proposition which is entirely foreign to my intention, and directed both his argument and his inquiry to something which I do not contemplate.

Now, if with that statement the Senator will permit me to proceed, he will perceive that I did not in any manner propose to infringe upon the well-guarded practice of the Senate to which he has alluded and the unfortunate consequences of the infraction which he has so forcibly stated.

I was illustrating, or endeavoring to do so, the principle upon which the practice is based, and I was calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that that rule of practice was based upon the great distinguishing feature which characterizes this body, of freedom of debate, and not only of freedom of debate, but of giving the opportunity to a minority, even though that minority may be confined to one person, of being heard, even though no other Senator in the Chamber might agree with him—certainly a most valuable part of what we consider to be the distinguishing characteristic of this body. The point I was going to make was not, as anticipated by the learned and distinguished Senator from Maine, that a Senator would be entitled not only to be heard on one day or on two days, but on every day of the session; the point that I was going to make was that this resolution had never had any opportunity of one day. That is the point I propose to make.

Mr. President, I can not, of course, allude to anything which occurred in secret session. I can speak of what occurred in the open session. I say I can not allude to anything that occurred in secret session. I can not so far as to narrate any distinct occurrence. I can only allude to it so far as is necessary to support the point which I make. In the open session on the second day when this resolution was called up, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in accordance with a rule of the Senate and in accordance with his right, moved that the resolution be considered in secret session of the Senate, and that having been seconded by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the presiding officer properly, under the rule, directed that the galleries be cleared and the doors be closed and that the matter should thereafter proceed in secret.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make a suggestion to him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. MORGAN. I would suggest to the Senator that the full situation has not been stated. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] had his resolution before the Senate in regular form to be considered on its merits. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BACON. He said he would, but he did not move it.

Mr. LODGE. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Georgia. I never made that motion.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator said he was going to make it.

Mr. LODGE. Ah! I said I would make it if the Senator from Georgia did not care to discuss the matter. He did care to discuss it, and I never made the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the resolution was before the Senate without any motion at all, except on the question of its adoption. Then it was that on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, seconded by the Senator from Rhode Island, the Senate went into secret legislative session. What took place there nobody is at liberty to say. Yet we all know what took place, and we know that no final disposition was made of the resolution. It is back in the Senate.

Mr. President, the action of the Senate in taking up the resolution and considering it is at least a continuous action beyond the hiatus that has taken place, about which nobody has a right to speak. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, otherwise it is in the power of any two Senators on this floor, in respect to this rule about secret legislative session, to put an absolute check upon any Senator who chooses to rise in this body to make a remark.

Mr. BACON. The point I make is in direct accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama. The point I make is that, so far as the record discloses, there has never been a consideration of this resolution, and I challenge any Senator to give to the Senate any evidence of the fact that the resolution has ever been considered by the Senate. The resolution stands exactly in the same attitude as if when it was called up, before its consideration was entered upon and before any discussion was had, something else, never mind what, had intervened which removed it from the consideration of the Senate. I assert it as a fact that neither then nor any other time has this resolution been considered by the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Or removed from its consideration.

Mr. BACON. Or removed from its consideration. If there were a rigid rule, or even if it were in accordance with the practice of the Senate or in harmony with the principle of that practice, that when a resolution was called up and had ever been declared in order, it should not be considered thereafter on any subsequent day, even though it had never been considered, then, it seems to me, there might be at least some objection to the correctness of the point of order which I make. But with the practice being simply that there shall be a consideration of a resolution, and that any resolution introduced by a Senator, although it may not be considered on the first day, shall have the right of consideration, and when the fact exists that it never has had that consideration, I say that in accordance with the principle, according to the rule and the principle, it is now in order, because it has never had its day in court; and I challenge any Senator to say that either under one circumstance or any other circumstance this resolution has ever been discussed or has been before the body for discussion.

Mr. President, what are the facts? The facts, as I was proceeding to state at the time when the Senator from Alabama interrupted me, were that when the resolution was laid before the Senate for consideration, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] moved that the Senate consider the question in secret session. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] seconded the motion. When the Senate went into secret session, for what purpose did it go into secret session? Did it go into secret session to consider this resolution? The rule does not say so. The rule says that the doors shall be immediately closed, and that the Senate shall decide behind closed doors whether it will consider the matter in secret session. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts was that the doors should be closed for the purpose prescribed in the rule, to wit, for the Senate to determine in secret session whether it would consider the resolution in secret session. That was all. It went no further. That is the rule; and I am not at liberty to say what vote was taken in secret session. But so far as this record discloses, so far as the record of the proceedings of the Senate shows, that is the extent to which the Senate has ever gone; and I challenge any Senator to say whether the Senate at any time ever went any further than to consider the single question whether or not the resolution should be considered behind closed doors.

Mr. President, that is the attitude, that is the position, and when the resolution came up for consideration it was not considered, it was not discussed, but in obedience to a rule, the Senate went into secret session for the purpose of determining whether or not the matter should be considered in secret session, and there is no evidence that it ever determined to consider it in secret session, or that it ever was considered in secret session.

Mr. ALDRICH. How could there be?

Mr. BACON. I challenge any Senator here to say it ever was considered in secret session.

Mr. ALDRICH. I challenge the Senator from Georgia to say it was not.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Rhode Island will recognize my right to say it was not, I will say it very promptly.

Mr. ALDRICH. One statement or the other may be made with equal propriety.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Indiana will pardon me. I will yield as soon as I reply to the Senator from Rhode Island. I can not reply to both at the same time, or I would with great pleasure extend my courtesy to that limit.

The Senator from Rhode Island asks me if I am prepared to say that the resolution was not considered in secret session. I reply to him that I can not say, and I can not say it because of my obligation; but I reply that the affirmative must appear to the Senate, either here in open session or in secret session, under such circumstances as it may determine, that there has been consideration of the resolution by the Senate in order to remove it from the consideration of the Senate, to take away from it its right to consideration and to put it upon the Calendar.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. BACON. No; I am not. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I will yield to him with the greatest of pleasure, as I always do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very good.

Mr. BACON. But I can not reply to two at once.

The facts known to the Senate, the facts as appearing to the Senate, the facts upon which the open Senate must act in open Senate, if it acts in open Senate, are that when this matter was up for discussion it was not discussed, that it was not considered, that no motion was made relative thereto, but that the question was raised, not that it should be considered in secret session, but the question was raised that the Senate should go into secret session for the purpose of determining whether or not the resolution would be considered in secret session, and that, so far as the open session of the Senate goes, is the limit of the action of the Senate.

Now, if the rule had permitted the Senate before going into secret session to determine that question in public, and the Senate had determined that it would go into secret session for that purpose, it would be a different case. But the Senate did not go into secret session for the purpose of considering the resolution. It went into secret session, under the rule, for the purpose of determining whether it would consider the resolution in secret session, and so far as the RECORD goes the sole question considered by the Senate in secret session was whether or not it would consider the resolution in secret session.

Now I will hear the Senator from Indiana with much pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to a question of privilege. We can not explain this situation to each other and discuss it in open session. Something took place in secret session that we have not any right to refer to here at all. I therefore move that the further consideration of the question now before the Senate be had in secret legislative session of the Senate, if I can get a second.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will not make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there a second?

Mr. PETTUS. I second the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a second, and the Chair directs that the galleries be cleared and the doors closed.

The doors were thereupon closed.

During the proceedings with closed doors, the Vice-President overruled the question of order raised by Mr. BACON, and decided that the resolution submitted by him on the 8th instant had been laid before the Senate on the 9th instant under the uniform rule and practice, and that the Senate had closed its doors on the motion to consider it in secret session, and having had its day in court, under the rule it had been placed on the Calendar, and could only be taken up for consideration upon motion or by unanimous consent.

After two hours and forty-five minutes with closed doors, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 15, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 11, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 68) relating to the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation made for the miscellaneous items of the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1906 is hereby made available for the payment of salaries and labor heretofore or hereafter specifically ordered by the House of Representatives of the present Congress, in addition to the purposes for which said appropriation is otherwise available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUBSTITUTE PENSION DAY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday of next week be substituted for Friday, to-morrow, for the special order for the consideration of pension bills. I understand the gentleman from New Hampshire does not object to that.

Mr. SULLOWAY. There is no objection, Mr. Speaker, as for as I am aware.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will say the day immediately following the final vote on the Philippine tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the day following the vote upon the Philippine tariff bill be substituted for Friday of this week under the special order. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is it certain that they are going to get that day now?

Mr. PAYNE. I say the day following the final vote upon the Philippine tariff bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it certain they are going to have that day you name?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be closed at the final rising of the committee on Saturday of this week.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate on House bill No. 3 be closed Saturday next at the adjournment of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York as to whether he has consulted with Mr. WILLIAMS, who is not on the floor at this moment?

Mr. PAYNE. I have not had an opportunity to consult with Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would ask the gentleman to let his request go over until Mr. WILLIAMS is on the floor, because he is the leader on this side.

Mr. PAYNE. I will withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker, but I may renew it subsequently, and I want to give notice unless this request is granted immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday I shall move that general debate on this bill be closed. I now ask for a vote upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3, the Philippine tariff bill, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who had the floor and gave way for a motion that the committee rise last evening, reserving the balance of his time, is entitled to the floor this morning.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio, who now has the floor, my colleague, shall be allowed to continue and conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his colleague from the same State be permitted to continue until he shall have concluded his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I am conscious of the fact that an unusual length of time has been consumed by a number of gentlemen who have preceded me, and while I was anxious to have the consent of the House, which has been so generously given to me, I, nevertheless, will curtail my remarks as far as possible, conscious that I shall not occupy an unreasonable length of time if I succeed in making myself fairly understood to the audience. I shall not, Mr. Chairman, go over the ground that has been so well traveled by those who have preceded me. The distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee placed before the House with absolute frankness and with exhaustive detail all the real provisions and purposes of the bill, and, with all due respect to the gentlemen who have contested upon the other side of this question, I will not repeat nor add anything to the able speech of the opening Member, nor yet to the elaborate and perfect presentation made by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. Chairman, the questions which have arisen along the pathway upon which we have traveled since the memorable year 1898 have been logical in their origin, logical in their development, and logical in the presentation that they make of the questions here to-day. When a nation goes to war by the deliberate act of the war-making power, that nation assumes all the natural and probable matters and things that grow out of the condition of war which they have created. The American people went to war under peculiar circumstances. Occupying the position which I did upon this floor; occupying the position that I did with relation to the then administration of the executive office of the Government; believing, as I did, that the war with Spain was not necessary; believing, as I did, that everything we fought for would have been and could have been easily, or ultimately, at least, attained without war, I stood with the President and with the majority of the Republicans on this floor and did all in my pwer to delay the declaration of war, with the hope that war need not come. Every demand that was made by the McKinley Administration, every demand made upon Spain by the United States through its diplomacy was yielded until we came to the single remaining question, namely: Would Spain finally, in view of the position which the people of the United States had taken, withdraw from the island of Cuba and grant independence to her people? The American people had so far committed themselves to the affirmative of that question that it seemed impossible that we could yield that demand, and Spain, compromising step by step, yielding first this concession and then that concession, finally, I believe—and that is what history will say—was on the point of crowning the Republican Administration of this country with the glory of the achievement of free Cuba without war, when the accident, or casualty, or whatever you may call it—the destruction of the Maine in Habana Harbor—precipitated war, with all its consequences.

Every step taken, from the declaration of war down to the present time, has been the logical and inevitable result of that war, and the American people have no more right now to shrink from a responsibility which that great catastrophe brought to their doors than would the American people at that time have dared to shrink from the duty of war when our ultimatum was presented and rejected by Spain. Not alone, Mr. Chairman, these necessary, logical, and inevitable results, not alone all of them, but the action of both political parties, from the beginning of the war down until a certain period of time, placed upon the American people the duty which the majority on this floor is to-day trying to discharge. I do not care to turn aside here and point out that the time came when the American people might well have called a halt in the progress of events that were driving us to where we are now. The time was when ultimately, and under our Constitution, the American people through their representatives in the Senate of the United States were called upon to say whether they would not only ratify all that had passd, but take all the responsibility that should come in the future. And both parties assumed that responsibility, and so urgent was it, so pressing was it, that the great leader of the Democratic party of that day, and, I may say, of to-day, came to Washington. I say leader of the Democratic party, for while he is absent he is not forgotten, and while he may suffer defeat the spirit of Bryan permeates the Democratic party to-day as no Democrat has ever permeated the spirit of the Democratic party since the grave closed over old Andrew Jackson. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You might as well meet things as they are. I am going to meet them exactly as my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who would be less powerful if he were more inclined to turn corners and avoid responsibilities than he is. It is the frankness of the man and the courage of the man that makes him dangerous in a controversy. So great was the emergency that that great leader of the Democratic party stripped himself of the ornaments and decorations of the high military office that he held and made haste by limited trains to arrive in Washington and appeal to the Democrats in the Senate to ratify that convention. And it was ratified. Without his aid it could not have been. And he secured the indorsement of the whole Democratic party for the action which he took in securing the ratification of that treaty by being again overwhelmingly nominated in 1900 for President and overwhelmingly defeated shortly afterwards.

The nomination of Mr. Bryan in 1900 was a distinct, formal, and sweeping indorsement of his record in war and peace, and while a majority of the Democratic Senators voted for this ratification, yet the whole party joined in its indorsement of Bryan, and thereby assumed the responsibility, as they will always have to assume it, for an equal participation in the ratification of the treaty of Paris.

So we come now to a discussion of the duty that is cast upon us by the terms of the treaty of Paris. That is all there is to it. Who stands here to-day undertaking to say that they have a right to say as American citizens, as statesmen, as members of the legislative department, that the action of this Government through its legally constituted authorities ought not to have been taken, and that therefore you will put an impediment in the way of the discharge of our duty herein?

Mr. Chairman, so much upon this question. I shall not discuss the question of what is to be done with the Philippines. There comes to my mind, when I think of that topic, this suggestion always: The American people never did a mean thing on earth; they never did a cowardly thing; they never disgraced themselves; they never tarnished the American flag; they never threw discredit upon the integrity, honor, uprightness, and intelligence of the American people as looked at by all the nations of the world, and what American will begin in this year of grace, or in any other year that lies ahead of us? That is my position. I assume the burden of the white man or the black man or the brown man, or any other man, when going forward to the discharge of my duty, laid upon me legitimately and by proper authority of the people of my country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have reached the point where a Republican Administration, after a long and painful study and careful consideration of every fact involved, with full knowledge of all the interests of the Philippine Islands, with a full, intelligent knowledge of the effect of this legislation upon the people of the United States, comes at the beginning of the second session of Congress, when this question has been submitted, and calls upon the assemblage here to stand by the Administration and see to it that its purposes in this behalf are not defeated.

What would be the effect of defeat now of this Administration measure? If we shall get any Democratic votes in favor of the passage of this bill, I shall not thank them for those votes, for they will be given to us upon a pretended reason that I repudiate; and if a man comes to me and offers me a pecuniary favor because he says I am too fair to own my own wrong, I reject his proposition; and if a Democrat comes to me and says that he proposes to vote for this bill because it is a step toward free trade, I reject his proposition, and say to him, "You can ride in the Jim Crow car if you want to; I don't want you in the first-class coach in which I ride." [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask you what would be the chance of passing this bill through the House without some Democratic votes over here?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think they would be very good.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If all Democrats vote against it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You better begin ciphering on the insurrectos over there then. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not cipher. I have a mighty reliance upon the Republican majority of the House of Representatives. I have great confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of my colleagues, and when brought face to face with the situation, even after the powerful arguments that have been offered here in opposition to this bill, I believe that the gentleman who votes against this bill will do it against his own better judgment and because of an impelling power which I will refer to briefly and shortly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That impelling power is the power of the machine of this House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said he who voted against the bill would do so because of an impelling power. You have got the impelling power at the wrong end of the boat. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is a gentleman in this House that has greater faith and confidence in the American doctrine of protection than I have. I do not boast of a designation by which I am sometimes designated, as a "stand-patter." The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said that we got that term from some disreputable source. He seems to have gone us one or two better in the course of his very able speech the other day and quoted from an authority quite as disreputable, the poker table.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I "raised" you. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. He "raised" us; I do not know what that means [renewed laughter]; but I will try to "see" what there is in the proposition. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. You will "call" him, will you?

Mr. GROSVENOR. But, Mr. Chairman, I have never seen a time yet when I would stand for every item and defend every item in the schedules of any tariff bill that I ever saw. I never saw the time when I claimed that all the items were consistent in every schedule of any tariff bill.

It is necessary and inevitable that with the long list of articles covered by the various schedules of the tariff bill there should be conditions that involve concessions and compromises and yielding of opinions and all that, and then again come the changes in business. Take the Dingley bill itself, passed in 1897, nearly nine years ago, and necessarily business conditions, conditions of production, conditions of markets, and conditions of the method of manufacture have all conspired to make some items of that bill suggestive of the propriety of changes when the proper time shall come and under proper circumstances.

If I should die before this term ends, and somebody should want to speak a good word for me, I want him to say that I boasted on the floor of the House that no man could find a time in the twenty years of my service when I had been absolutely consistent upon all these and kindred questions in all the details of my action in any two years of that time. [Laughter.] I indorse and adopt the statement in Lord Brougham's speech in the British House of Lords on a subject involving such a question as is here.

At the end of the Napoleonic war England was led to put a stop to the licenses granted under the intercourse act for importing provisions in foreign bottoms. The United States retaliated by shutting her ports against all vessels coming from ports from whence her vessels were excluded. In his speech on manufacturing distress, March 13, 1817, commenting on the fact that whatever may have been the good policy of the navigation law, it was unwise to adhere to its enactments a century after the cause for them had ceased to exist, Lord Brougham said as follows:

Here is a striking specimen of that obstinate, perverse system that refuses to vary with the alteration of circumstances; that will not accommodate itself to the progress of events, or follow the course of times and seasons, but clings superstitiously to what is now inapplicable, though it may once have been important, as if time were standing still and history were not the record of unceasing change.

We live, Mr. Chairman, in a period of time when conditions are changing, when conditions are driving legislation and executive action, when new questions are to be decided and new important results to grow out of them, when new elements are entering in, and he who can not meet the growing exigencies of a country and of times like these is not fit to be trusted by the American people. Consistency may become stubborn adherence to a record which needs to be changed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, he has just stated that he is not wedded to any particular tariff schedule, that he does not object to amending or revising or adjusting certain ones.

I should like to ask him which one of those tariff schedules he is willing to go in with us and revise? We might all get together—all of us "tariff reformers."

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is very ingenious, and always puts words into the mouth of his opponent that his opponent did not use. I said I never was wedded to all of the items of a tariff bill. Is that saying that I am ready now to enter into some kind of a revision of the tariff?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Which schedules of the Dingley tariff are you not wedded to? We want to get the chance for revision.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When you put yourself in the attitude of being entitled to call on me for details I will furnish them to you. That time has not come yet. [Laughter.]

So, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to vote for this bill from the standpoint of a "stand-patter." I would not vote for this bill if it would be injurious, in my judgment, to a great industry in this country. I am not complaining of the gentlemen who are so earnestly and so honestly standing for what they believe to be resistance to an attack upon a great industry of theirs. I admire the pluck, the courage, and everything else except the intelligence of the gentlemen who are doing this. [Laughter.] I differ with them about the facts. I was here when we had the Porto Rican trouble. I was here when we had the Cuban trouble. Why, all the prophets, from Jeremiah—who, I believe, is one of the major prophets—down to the least among the minor prophets, never uttered one-tenth part of the prophetic declarations that were uttered by gentlemen on this floor as to the sad effects that were to come to this country from the Porto Rican tariff and afterwards from the Cuban reciprocity bill. And yet here we are, living in the most prosperous hour of the most prosperous year that this country or any other country ever saw, and I can prove it even by the speech of the governor of Massachusetts, who can shout one minute and shed tears the next—shout for the grand prosperity of Massachusetts, and then cry over a cent and a quarter additional cost on a pair of shoes. [Laughter.]

I am not going any further. I have said already that I accept as conclusive and unanswerable the speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and mere prophetic declarations of these gentlemen will not swerve me from that belief. Why, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to say a great deal about the details of the food upon which we have been fed upon this occasion.

I listened to the testimony of a very able, careful, shrewd witness, who traveled all over certain portions of the Philippine Islands in the interest of the beet-sugar people of this country. He was there when the Taft party was there. We did not see him. It was said he was sick in a hospital; but he came home loaded with a wonderful amount of facts, as he called them. Now, if you will take his testimony—and they rely upon it more than all the rest they have on the other side of this question—you will find that there is not one word of the testimony of Mr. Hathaway that would not be ruled out as incompetent in any justice's court in the United States. He has not given you a single fact that is worth anything that he does not emphatically say is hearsay. He tells you that he met somebody at such a place, and that person told him so-and-so. There was a Commission in the islands taking testimony, and those gentlemen might all have been called there and have testified and been cross-examined, but we never heard of one of them. But at last we discovered the vulnerable point in Hathaway's testimony. He had Munchausen reports from all over the islands of the tremendous quantity of sugar that could be raised per acre, the very great cheapness with which it could be produced, and finally we discovered that when he made his appearance in those islands he gave notice to the people, or let it be understood, that he represented a vast capital of money in the United States that was over there to buy sugar lands, and if there is any people on earth that can paint a picture of future prosperity it is the Filipino sugar raisers.

Mr. FORDNEY. May I interrupt the gentleman? What information was there in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee that Mr. Hathaway made any such investigation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was not very strong evidence, but he stated it in my hearing. [Laughter.] He said so in his own testimony.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was not printed in the hearings.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He admitted that he went there and represented himself to be in the interests of gentlemen that would probably, if he made a favorable report, invest largely in sugar lands in the Philippine Islands. My friend will not deny that.

Mr. DALZELL. If my colleague will allow me, he so stated, and that when he came home he made a report to his people against the investment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; he came home with all that florid statement that he heard and was wise and shrewd enough to say to his people, "We don't want to buy any of that land;" and I would say the same thing. Well, so much for that. I have heard this testimony, observed what I could, and I will round up on this question in a very few words. I do not believe that the passage of this bill, even if it had absolute free trade in it in sugar and tobacco, would come anywhere near in ten years' time compensating for the growth of consumption of sugar and tobacco in the United States.

I noticed the other day that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who does not seem to be in his seat, made some very strong remarks about anybody who was silly enough to believe or be affected by the absurd story that though the Philippine producer of sugar and tobacco would not bring his product into this market, yet the passage of this bill would be a benefit to him.

I may not have the intelligence of the gentleman from Wyoming, and he shall be at liberty to single me out as one of the men out of the class that he branded. He can have me. I was puzzled a little just as he was, only I did not decide the question so promptly as he did, and I did not call anybody a fool for believing differently from what I did. I was worried about this proposition. Finally here came a very intelligent man. I asked a good many other questions of the same sort, but here was evidently a man who understood everything connected with the raising, marketing, and selling of sugar of the Philippine Islands. He was a well-educated man, a man who spoke finely—he did not speak in any language that I understood, but he spoke well—and when his language was interpreted, as it was, it was very fine language, even after it had been subjected to the interpretation which was made rapidly as he spoke. I said to him, "You state, in the first place, that if this law should pass, nevertheless you will not send your products to the United States?" "That is what I said." "In the next place, you say it will greatly benefit the people of the Philippine Islands to have this law passed?" "That is what I say." "Now," I said, "will you kindly make it manifest to me, so that I can understand, how you can bring that about?" He went very patiently, but calmly and pleasantly, to work and reached this result: He said, "Our sugar market is in China and Japan"—and I might say to the gentleman from Wyoming that every man with ordinary understanding knows that, but I won't apply that language to him or anybody else. In this world we do not carry heavy commodities 10,000 miles when the best market with the least competition in it in all the world lies within 1,500 miles.

Mr. MONDELL (who had just come upon the floor). Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not heard what the gentleman said in regard to myself, except the last remark, but I think the gentleman just said that anyone who had any sense—and, of course, I must be included in that category—knew that the market for the sugar of the Philippine Islands was in China and Japan.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I am trying to answer your proposition, that the statement that the repeal of the Dingley tariff on sugar would not crowd the American market. I have entered upon the job of making it apparent to you, if possible, and at least I hope to reach the point so that the next time the gentleman speaks of men who believe as I do the gentleman will modify the language he puts into his speech.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the gentleman from Ohio did not say, as I understood him to say, that the market for the Philippine sugar was in China and Japan?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; I did say so.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, why do they ask us to give them an advantage of $1.20 on the basis of muscovado sugar in our market from other tropical sugars if the market is not here, but in China or Japan?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman had come in a little earlier or had stayed out a little later I would have done that. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. Will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. There is not a pound of muscovado sugar coming from the Philippine Islands. It is all molasses sugar, and if the gentleman from Wyoming bases his statement on that proposition he bases it on a thing that does not exist.

Mr. MONDELL. I use the word "muscovado," because it is a word largely used in commerce, but I could have used the word "molasses" equally as well. It would have been quite as proper. What I did say applies to molasses sugar. I was simply referring to the fact the average duty on Philippine sugar, call it what you may, in the markets of the United States without any rebate or reduction is $1.20 a hundred, and if their market is in China, why do they ask a reduction of $1.20 a hundred in our markets?

Mr. DALZELL. There is a fundamental difference between muscovado sugar and the sugar that comes from the Philippines.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman, as far as my argument is concerned, it is entirely immaterial.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think it is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have taken infinite pains to make that the one plain proposition of my whole speech, and I did it for the sole purpose of enlightening the gentleman from Wyoming. I said he was not here, and I regretted it, but I had to make it, and now he has spoiled all I have said and will not understand what I say hereafter. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I will say, Mr. Chairman, I will not unless the gentleman is a little more clear in his statements hereafter than he has been up to this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have been very clear, but he did not hear it. Now, let me restate this proposition. I asked this very intelligent gentleman—I will not go into the details now about the language and his wide fund of knowledge—I said to him: "You say now you want this tariff taken off in the interest of the sugar raiser of the Philippine Islands, and yet in the next breath you say if it is taken off nevertheless you will not go there with your commodity." Now, then, I just reached that point. I will now go on. Of course everybody knows who knows anything about it, and my friend from Wyoming knows a good deal about it, knows the sugar that is sold in China and Japan is almost exclusively unrefined sugar. There is not a great business in refining sugar in the Orient. Conditions are not favorable to the refining of sugar. There is an attempt at refining in two large institutions in Hongkong, but the great body of the sugar that is raised in the Philippine Islands or anywhere else in the Orient is sold in China and Japan as "brown sugar," as we would call it, or "raw sugar," as the trade would call it. Now, then, the merchant of China comes to the city of Iloilo, and conscious of his power he makes this statement: "I want so many tons of raw sugar and I will give you so much a ton for it." Now, then, what are the elements that stand to either compel the merchants of Iloilo to sell that sugar or to refuse to sell it? He takes his pencil and begins to figure, first the freight to New York, then loading at Iloilo, then a cent and upward duty on the sugar in New York, and the Chinaman has figured it out just as closely as the Filipino has. He knows just exactly how much duty will have to be paid in New York; he knows just exactly how much freight will have to be paid and insurance and everything else of that character, and he makes his figures accordingly, and he makes his proposition to the Filipino commission merchant, or whatever he may be, and that merchant has no other market, I say to the gentleman from Wyoming, and therefore he must sell his sugar with the impediment of our tariff standing in the way.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Unless the gentleman wants to ask me something I do not think he ought to cut into my argument by attempting to answer it now.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman does not care to yield——

Mr. GROSVENOR. If you think I have not now made it plain.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman to say the Filipino had no other market except the markets of China and Japan. Of course he has the market of the world, as the Java planter and the Borneo planter has, and has he not also under the present reduction an advantage of nearly $7 a ton on the 88 cents that he now pays on the average?

Mr. GROSVENOR. He has that advantage.

Mr. MONDELL. And is not that more than the effort to give them an insurance?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That may be, but yet the remaining unrepealed portion of the duty stands in his way just exactly as much.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not caring what weight all this has. I have tried to show that the Filipino merchant is interested to the extent of our tariff because it stands against the price he can obtain for his sugar, no matter where he attempts to sell it. So much for that.

I will not say anything about tobacco. I represent a State that has a large tobacco interest in it, and if I thought the poor miserable stuff that is produced in the archipelago of the Philippines would come into competition so as to injure the tobacco of my State I would be sorry for the tobacco of my State. There is not a pound of that Manila tobacco that can be sold in the Cincinnati markets at any price whatever. There is not a raiser of tobacco in the Miami Valley that would turn aside for one moment to consider taking that tobacco by the ton if it were given to him.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman send a box of the average Manila cigars to a constituent of his whose vote he wanted?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would; but I would do it in this way: I would say, first, "My friend, I do not smoke; therefore I do not know anything about these. If these are not fit to smoke, you can use them as curiosities." In that way I might be tempted to do it, but I would not send a box to the skilled gentleman, my colleague, whose good taste and accuracy of judgment in these matters are proverbial, who has addressed me just now.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is, if you wanted to maintain his friendship?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and I certainly value it very highly.

Well, Mr. Chairman, so much for this question. I do not mean alone the Cabinet, I do not mean alone the Senate or the House of Representatives when I say I do not wish to see the Administration balked in its purposes toward the Philippine Islands. I mean that I am not willing to see the onward progress that the Republican party has made in the discharge of its sworn duty to the Philippine Islands broken down and turned back and chaos reigning where there ought to be harmony and unity of action. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The present Administration of the Government has been industrious, intelligent, and patriotic, following up the line of administrative action laid down by the McKinley Administration in the early days of our administration of this important duty. There was no man in the United States who could have been selected who would have been better fitted for the position than the distinguished gentleman, William H. Taft, and if ever a man devoted himself intelligently, devotedly, and unselfishly to the accomplishment of a great purpose that man was Taft. Standing by the interests of his own country and the Administration which he represented, he nevertheless so administered his high office as to challenge and receive the approval, admiration, and affection of the Filipino people. In our excursions through the islands it was marvelous to witness the enthusiastic admiration that the common people had for Taft. Taft is an American, a Republican, and a strong supporter of the principles and policies of the Republican party, and yet he comes here zealous in support of this bill and comes here as a representative of the Republican party and a representative in the highest degree of the best sentiment of the American people.

Now, then, a very few words about the Filipino. I do not expect to be here at the time, but I want to say to the gentlemen that the hardest things that have been said about the future of the Philippine Islands, the talk about the degraded people, their stupidity, their ignorance, their poverty, their barbarism, all of the most eloquent language that has ever been used during the whole of these past years pale into insignificance as compared with the description that Daniel Webster gave of all the people in the great territory we acquired from Mexico and upon which stands the great State of California and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. I quote from Mr. Webster's speech in Congress:

There are some things one can argue against with temper and submit to, if overruled, without mortification. There are other things that seem to affect one's consciousness of being a sensible man and to imply a disposition to impose upon his common sense. And of this class of topics, or pretensions, I have never heard of anything more ridiculous in itself, more absurd, and more affrontive to all sober judgment than the cry that we are getting indemnity by the acquisition of New Mexico and California. I hold they are not worth a dollar; and we pay for them vast sums of money.

Go back, you gentlemen who think you can foretell things, and think you can see ahead of them, and read what the great leaders of sentiment in the Senate and House of Representatives said when the question of ratifying the treaty with France by which we acquired the Louisiana purchase came. You will find that they were limited in their scope to the Allegheny Mountains, and they did not believe that God himself would ever have anything to do with anybody that did not live on this side of the mountains, and I am afraid that some of them are in the same boat to-day [laughter], as I will attempt to show you after a little.

When the nation's claims to the Oregon country were under consideration, a distinguished United States Senator, Mr. McDuffie, said:

What is the nature of the country? Why, as I understand it, 700 miles this side of the Rocky Mountains is uninhabitable—a region where rain seldom falls, a barren, sandy soil, mountainous, totally impassable. Well, now, what are we going to do in this case? How are you going to employ steam? Have you made anything like an estimate of the cost of a railroad from here to the Columbia? Why, the wealth of the Indies would be insufficient. Of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? Why, I would not for that purpose give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory. I thank God for His mercy in placing the Rocky Mountains there.

And when the purchase of Alaska was contemplated, Benjamin F. Butler, a Representative from Massachusetts, declared:

If we are to pay for Russia's friendship this amount, I desire to give her the $7,200,000 and let her keep Alaska. * * * I have no doubt that any time within the last twenty years we could have had Alaska for the asking. I have heard it was so stated in the Cabinets of two Presidents, provided we would have taken it as a gift. But no man, except one insane enough to buy the earthquakes in St. Thomas and the ice fields in Greenland, could be found to agree to any other terms for its acquisition to the country.

I believe that the Philippine Islands will become one of the greatest jewels in the crown of American achievement. Mr. Chairman, a people domestic, orderly, well behaved, willing to work, temperate in their habits, and sending under these conditions more than half a million of children to the English schools in those islands, rapidly adjusting themselves to American customs, to American law, to American purposes, who people that rich country—not all tobacco land, not all sugar land, not all abacá land, but a country competent to support the whole population and raise products to be sent abroad—a people that will thus adjust themselves to American customs and American conditions is a people not to be treated in the manner that the Philippine people are being treated by some of our statesmen. It may be a long time. Well, this country is going to last a long time. This country will have obligations to the people of the Philippines when the youngest Member of this House is dead and his grandchildren are in Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not the optimistic view which the gentleman expresses, and with which I agree, relative to the Filipinos and their possibilities, the view that all the gentlemen have taken who have opposed the bill? And is it not true that the other view of the Filipinos, the view that pictures him as impossible of improvement and his country impossible of development, the view that has been taken by the gentlemen who are for the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The argument of the gentleman, to the man who is utterly selfish and feels no obligation to God or man or duty, is a strong argument. It does not have any effect upon me whatever. I owe an obligation to a source that is higher.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman owe a higher obligation to the Filipinos than to the people of the United States?

Mr. GROSVENOR. To the Almighty above any human being; and when I believe He has laid a duty on me, I will try to discharge it if I may in so doing do harm to nobody else.

Now we are getting into a field of operation in which I do not think either one of us has been famous up to this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, at this fortunate or unfortunate time, as it may be, in the history of our country, the Democratic party on this floor, through its most fearless and able champion—of course I need not say I refer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]—comes here and seeks to stir up trouble about the tariff question; and I am going to refer to one or two of the propositions he made the other day. I give him notice now that if he ever again attempts to assault the memory of James G. Blaine I shall rise up in condemnation of him. I am going to give him the fullest opportunity to apologize after my speech is finished [laughter]; and if he does not do it, I give him notice he must never read that extract from Blaine's book on the tariff of 1846 without reading a whole lot more with it. Mr. Blaine wrote a book. He wrote the facts of history on events, events that he had witnessed and events that he had not witnessed; and I have never yet heard anybody charge him with unfairness, especially in the first volume of his writings. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] undertook to bring Mr. Blaine into court to testify so as to impeach the Republican platform of 1904. He indicted the platform, and he made some remarks more or less complimentary to the supposed author of the platform, a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, when he proposed to assail it. Now I am going to quote the platform exactly; I am going to say to you that he got the idea of that platform from a speech that was made a number of years ago in the Senate of the United States by Senator Harry Davis, of West Virginia, in which he said, in substance, he had lived a long time, that he had studied the tariff question, and he always noticed that when we had a high tariff we had prosperity, and when we had a low tariff we had adversity; and Mr. LODGE, a wonderful historian, who looks into all the publications, had discovered, I assume, Mr. Davis's speech, and he incorporated it in substance and effect into the platform upon which Roosevelt was nominated for President. The substantial effect of that platform is that whenever we have had low tariff it has done harm, and whenever we had a high tariff we have had good times. Now, I am going to make a few brief remarks for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri, and in the first place I am going to put his witness on the stand, and I am going to quote the whole of that witness's testimony.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say in ordinary fairness that the gentleman from Ohio ought to quote all the sentence.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am going to quote it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, if that is your text, you ought to state what it is; no preacher is allowed to suppress an essential part of the sentence of his text that he is going to preach from.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And no man ought to read one paragraph of a man's statement before a court and then leave out another one.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not a man who ever practiced law twelve months in his life——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have practiced longer than that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have practiced longer than that—that does not invariably use that portion of the witness's statement on the other side that best suits his own case and leaves the other out if he wants to. [Laughter.] That's the rule laid down in the books, and it is a sensible rule. Now, if the gentleman does not know what that sentence in the Republican platform is, I will quote it to him verbatim.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have sent for it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad you have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am very proud of it. Now, then, what Mr. Blaine wrote is a very good statement of facts, but before I read the paragraph to which I have referred, I want to say that another gentleman—doubtless by error of knowledge—I can not make that apology for my friend from Missouri—undertook to assail Mr. Blaine upon the same proposition, no less a personage than Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Blaine made an answer to Mr. Gladstone, which I am going to read. It will be found in the North American Review, in a debate between those two great men, who are both dead.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to interrupt you, but I want to protest against your assuming that I assailed Blaine. I did not do anything of the sort.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not saying that you did.

Now, I want to give the gentleman the language of the platform of the Republican party, so that we can start square, and I say to him that it is in effect the same declaration that was made by Mr. Davis when he was a Senator:

A Democratic tariff has always been followed by business adversity; a Republican tariff by business prosperity.

There we are.

Now—

Says Mr. Blaine, about the tariff of 1846, which seems to be the sole oasis in the desert of Democratic tariff making—one of the most suggestive experiments of that kind—

Which is a tariff for revenue—had its origin in the tariff to which I have just referred, passed in 1846, in apparent harmony with England's newly declared financial policy.

At that moment a Southern President [Mr. Polk] and a Southern Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. Robert J. Walker] were far more interested in expanding the area of slave territory than in advancing home manufactures, and were especially eager to make commercial exchanges with Europe on the somewhat difficult basis of cotton at high prices and returning fabrics at low prices.

Under ordinary circumstances the free-trade tariff of 1846 would have promptly fallen under popular reprobation and been doomed to speedy repeal. But it had a singular history, and for a time was generally acquiesced in, even attaining in many sections a certain degree of popularity. Never did any other tariff meet with so many and so great aids of an adventitious character to sustain it as did this enactment of 1846. Our war with Mexico began just as the duties were lowered, and the consequence was the disbursement of more than $100,000,000 in a way that reached all localities and favorably affected all interests. This was a great sum of money for that period, and for the years 1846, 1847, and 1848 it considerably more than doubled the ordinary outlay of the Government. In the middle of this period the Irish famine occurred and called for an immense export of breadstuffs at high prices. The discovery of gold in California the succeeding year flushed the channels of business as never before by rapidly enlarging the circulation of coin in all parts of the country. Before this outpouring of gold had ceased the three great nations of Europe, as precedence was reckoned at that time—England, France, and Russia—entered upon the Crimean war. The export of manufactures from England and France was checked; the breadstuffs of Russia were blocked and could not reach the markets of the world. An extraordinary stimulus was thus given to all forms of trade in the United States. For ten years—1846 to 1856—these adventitious aids came in regular succession and exerted their powerful influence upon the prosperity of the country.

The withdrawal or termination of these influences, by a treaty of peace in Europe and by the surcease of gold from California, placed the tariff of 1846 where a real test of its merits or its demerits could be made. It was everywhere asked with apprehension and anxiety, Will this free-trade tariff now develop and sustain the business of the country as firmly and securely as it has been developed and sustained by protection? The answer was made in the ensuing year by a widespread financial panic.

I sometimes differ with my friend about the proper use of the word "panic," and I have had a great many very nice discussions with him as to whether panic and hard times mean the same thing. I say we can have a panic and not hard times, and we can have hard times and have no panic. Here we had a panic that came immediately after these adventitious matters had passed away.

The answer was made in the ensuing year by a widespread financial panic, which involved the ruin of thousands, including proportionately as many in the South as in the North, leaving the country disordered and distressed in all the avenues of trade. The disastrous results of this tariff upon the permanent industries of the country are described in President Buchanan's well-remembered message communicated to Congress after the panic.

Mr. Buchanan was a Democrat, the last Democratic President but one, I say. Doubtless my friend would hesitate, but he would be inclined to say that Buchanan was the last Democratic President this country had. This is what Mr. Buchanan said:

With unsurpassed plenty in all the elements of national wealth our manufacturers have suspended, our public works are retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds are abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers are thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

This testimony as to the result of a free-trade tariff is all the more forcible from the fact that Mr. Buchanan, as a member of President Polk's Cabinet, had consented to the abandonment of protection, which in his earlier career he had earnestly supported.

And a large amount more, showing that while Mr. Blaine admitted the ten years of prosperity, he always pointed out that there was a special reason for it, and always pointed out that when these adventitious supports fell away the crash came.

Now, here is what my friend [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] quoted, and if I have said that I thought he was unfair I certainly did not mean that, for he is the fairest man ever I had a controversy with. A man who knows as much as he does can afford to be fair. Here is what he said, and he read this, and I had heard it so often that I could almost repeat it by heart, but I never could get the documents to answer it until now:

The Whig victory of 1848 was not sufficiently decisive to warrant any attempt, even had there been desire, to change the tariff. General Taylor had been elected without subscribing to a platform or pledging himself to a specific measure, and he was therefore in a position to resist and reject appeals of the ordinary partisan character. Moreover, the tariff of 1846 was yielding abundant revenue, and the business of the country was in a flourishing condition at the time his Administration was organized. Money became very abundant after the year 1849, large enterprises were undertaken, speculation was prevalent, and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was general and apparently genuine. After 1852 the Democrats had almost undisputed control of the Government, and had gradually become a free-trade party. The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for the time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased, not only among the people, but among the protective economists, and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented Presidential candidates.

Now, then, right over on the other page, against this statement of Mr. Blaine, right in the same chapter, is this:

The one excuse given for urging the passage of the act of 1857——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman unnecessarily, but I want to ask him if the tariff of 1857 did not cut the tariff rates lower than the Walker revenue tariff?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; it did, and I will show you the effect of it:

The one excuse given for urging the passage of the act of 1857 was that under the tariff of 1846 the revenues had become excessive, and the income of the Government must be reduced.

To-day you hear the Democratic doctrinaire—and my friend from Missouri was in that line of battle in the last Congress—say that inasmuch as we were threatened with a deficit in the Treasury we should have to lower the tariff in order to replenish the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He says that the Walker tariff produced more revenue than was needed, but in 1857, by common consent of all parties, it was reduced unfortunately below the correct revenue point. I never have been in favor of cutting it below the revenue point. I am not now, because I want abundant revenue.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But while it stood at the revenue point it destroyed the industries of the country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is so, I want to ask you why the Whigs and Know-nothings and Democrats altogether joined on a proposition to cut the tariff lower than it was by the Walker tariff bill of 1846?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We were in an experimental stage then.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; the truth is we were in a prosperous stage and wanted to get rid of some of the surplus, but they put it too low.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I cite President Buchanan against the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He was in his dotage. I don't care a straw what he said. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was not in my dotage. I was just admitted to practice law in 1857, and the hardest time that I ever saw in the United States of America was then.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman. This panic of 1857 came on after the tariff bill of 1857 was passed on the 3d day of March?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is, after the repeal of the Walker tariff bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That message was sent in in December, 1857, after the panic.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will see that those dates are made absolutely correct:

But it was soon found to be a most expensive mode of reaching that end. The first and most important result flowing from the new act was a large increase in importations and a very heavy drain in consequence upon the reserved specie of the country to pay the balance which the reduced shipments of agricultural products failed to meet.

In the autumn of 1857—

That was before the passage of the tariff law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was nine months after the passage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right—

In the autumn of 1857, half a year after the passage of the tariff act, a disastrous financial panic swept over the country, prostrating for the time all departments of business in about the same degree. The agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests were alike and equally involved. The distress for a time was severe and widespread. The stagnation which ensued was discouraging and long continued, making the years from 1857 to 1860 extremely dull and dispiriting in business circles throughout the Union. The country was not exhausted and depleted as it was after the panic of 1837, but the business community had no courage, energy was paralyzed, and new enterprises were at a standstill.

That is what Mr. Blaine says, and I read it in his interest.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question right here. I ask the gentleman as a lawyer if that statement I read from Mr. Blaine is not a plain statement of facts by a historian which he felt called on in the cause of truth to say, and if what the gentleman has read from Blaine in addition to what I read is not a special plea of a protectionist to bolster up protection by reason of his love of protection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I decline to support any such proposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will suggest at this point that I will put into the RECORD at this part of my speech conclusive and unanswerable evidence that from the foundation of this Government every change of the tariff from higher to a lower tariff has brought more or less disaster upon the country, and I will put it there in the form of facts and figures that the gentleman from Missouri will not be able to answer, and therefore I conclude upon this proposition that the Republican platform of 1904, emanating from whatever source it may have emanated, is absolutely true, and is backed up by the concurrent evidence of the history of my country.

The documents which I here and now present I present with a deliberate challenge to the gentlemen on the other side of this question to assail the statements made and to show by historical proof that the statements are not correct. At the risk of being prolix and tedious, I think this matter is of the highest importance at this time, and the student of American commercial and financial history will find a wide and ever-interesting study as he goes through the record of the past to acquire wisdom for the discharge of his duty in the present.

The writer and compiler of these facts, Mr. Francis Curtis, is pretty well known to the people of this country, and I think I risk nothing in saying that his statement until contradicted will carry weight.

WHEN SHALL WE REVISE THE TARIFF?

(By Francis Curtis.)

It is manifestly due to those so-called tariff revisionists, both within and without the party, who are advocating an immediate change that those who oppose any change for the present should answer their query, "When shall we revise the tariff?"

First, a review of former revisions should be both profitable and instructive.

No material and complete revision of our first tariff of 1789 was made until 1812, when it was enacted:

"That an additional duty of 100 per cent upon the permanent duties now imposed by law upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States shall be levied and collected upon all goods, wares, and merchandise which shall, from and after the passing of this act, be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place."

And it was further enacted:

"That this act shall continue in force so long as the United States shall be engaged in war with Great Britain and until the expiration of one year after the conclusion of peace, and no longer: Provided, however, That the additional duties laid by this act shall be collected on all such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall have been previously imported."

This was the only complete revision of the tariff that has taken place in our history on account of war. The increase in tariff rates, coupled with the prohibitions of nonintercourse, threw us on our resources and resulted in the establishment of many new industries, which, in spite of the ravages of war, brought immense increase of national wealth and business activity. In a special message to Congress, February 20, 1815, President Madison asked—

"Deliberate consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars."

TARIFF ACT OF 1812.

The tariff act of 1812 provided for its own termination, which would have come without any legislation on February 17, 1816, one year after the treaty of Ghent was ratified. It was feared that the duties existing before the war would not afford sufficient protection to our newly established industries, and it was pretty well agreed on all sides that those duties should be increased. First, the act of 1812 was continued until June 30, 1816.

It was undoubtedly the purpose of the Members of the Fourteenth Congress to give us in the law of 1816 a thoroughly protective tariff, and yet it proved a failure, not because the principle upon which it was based was not protective in character, but because the spirit of industrialism which then prevailed in the mother country was such as to overcome with an inundation of goods the effects of protection which were not protective, simply because duties were not made high enough. In other words, moderate protection was no protection at all, and when England resolved to flood our country with her great accumulation of goods of all kinds, our tariff did not prove a sufficient barrier.

Our present revisionists would do well to study with great care the conditions and the results of that period of our history. For eight years we suffered as only a nation can suffer when she buys her goods from abroad and her own artisans are idle and unproductive. It was during this period that the tariff question as a great national policy came to the front in our politics and was most thoroughly debated, not only in both Houses of Congress but by the press and on the platform and through numberless pamphlets and speeches made throughout the country.

The result was a new tariff in 1824, which was intended to be, and which proved to be, thoroughly protective in character, and in the words of President McKinley: "The nation was quickened into new life, and the entire country under the tariff moved on to higher triumphs in industrial progress, and to a higher and better destiny for all of its people."

REVISION IN 1828.

So satisfactory was this tariff that it was still further revised in 1828, and higher duties substituted to such a degree that by its enemies it was called the "tariff of abominations," and its enactment marked the beginning of the secession spirit at the South, which led to nullification in 1832 and rebellion in 1861. In fact, it was the tariff of 1828 which brought about a sectional division which has not since been eradicated. Daniel Webster, the free trader of the early part of the century, seeing the benefits which accrued from the protective tariff of 1824, became himself one of the stanchest advocates of protection, because he saw that it was a benefit to the whole country, while John C. Calhoun, who had been a protectionist while Webster was a free trader, now believing that free trade would be better for his State and section, and jealous of the growing power of the North because of protection, became an ardent free trader.

The time spent in revising the tariff into the law of 1816 was thirty-nine days of actual consideration by both Houses of Congress and the President.

A considerable portion of the Sixteenth Congress, which began in December, 1819, was given up to a tariff controversy, but without legislation. The discussion was, however, productive of good.

FAILURE TO REVISE UPWARD.

As the country was now aroused to the necessity of a tariff which would put an end to foreign competition, the failure to revise the tariff in 1820 was a most severe disappointment to the protectionists throughout the country. Mr. Niles cites the case of a paper in Kentucky, the Lexington Public Inquirer, which at the failure of the bill came out with a black border and column rules, saying:

"Mourn, O ye sons and daughters of Kentucky! O ye inhabitants of the United States, put on sackcloth and ashes, for the great enemy of your independence has prevailed. You must still remain prostrate. Your agricultural productions must lie and rot on your hands."

Meetings were now held in various parts of the country, and memorials from all sides were presented to Congress. The Seventeenth Congress contented itself with resolutions, but no tariff legislation followed. The Eighteenth Congress, however, which met in December, 1823, took the matter up almost immediately. A bill was reported on January 9, 1824, and a discussion began on February 10. It passed on the 16th of April. The Senate began its consideration on the 28th of April and passed it on the 13th of May, it being signed by the President on May 25, having been debated and passed and approved in less than five months.

The Twentieth Congress met in December, 1827, and the new tariff bill was brought in on the last day of January following. It occupied the time of the House and the Senate about four months.

The so-called modified tariff of 1832 was not by any means a thorough revision, but simply contained amendments to the act of 1828. The compromise tariff of 1833 was, however, an entirely new measure, and was the result of conciliation to meet the demands of southern leaders. The enactment of the amendments to the tariff of 1828, which became known as the tariff of 1832, occupied but a few months, and was immediately followed by nullification.

COMPROMISE TARIFF OF 1832.

On the assembling of the Twenty-second Congress in December, 1832, the questions of nullification and the tariff were, of course, uppermost. A bill was reported on the 27th of December and discussion began on the 5th of January. On the 11th of February Mr. Clay gave notice in the Senate that he should on the next day ask leave to introduce a bill to modify the various acts imposing duties on imports. It was then that the basis of the compromise tariff was presented, and it must be remembered that it was presented by the father and founder of the American system of protection, as exemplified in the acts of 1824 and 1828. But Mr. Clay loved his country better than a section, and he believed that through compromise and conciliation he might save the Union, expecting that there would be found a way to protect our industries after the Union had been saved.

In the House of Representatives the so-called "Verplanck" bill had been for several weeks under debate, but the House was evidently waiting to see what the Senate would do, and the debates dragged along most wearily. On February 25, two days after the bill had passed the Senate, it was substituted in the House for the bill there pending, and it was approved by the President on March 21. But a few weeks had transpired in its discussion and enactment. In fact, up to this time three or four months at the longest was required for the framing and discussion and passage of a tariff law. Moreover, at no time could the tariff itself up to this period be called a paramount issue. Since 1820 the slavery question had been at the front, and the tariff question was always secondary. Even in the debate over the compromise of 1833 it was felt that the compromise itself was but a means toward an end—namely, the adjustment of the slavery question for the time being, if not for several years to come. The protectionists of the North preferred peace before all things and sacrificed the material interests of the country in order that peace might prevail.

The fiscal year 1834 then was entered upon with the prospect of constantly decreasing duties until all should be wiped out but 20 per cent by 1842. The crash came in 1837, and the worst panic and business depression which the country had yet known followed.

TARIFF OF 1842.

In 1840 the Democrats in their platform condemned protection and indorsed practical free trade, while the Whigs, although they adopted no platform, presented as their candidate William Henry Harrison, who was a strong protectionist. Mr. Harrison was elected, and with him John Tyler as Vice-President. Not only were these candidates successful, but a decided protectionist majority was elected to the next Congress. This Congress did not meet till December, 1841. Several attempts had been made to change the tariff of 1833, but none had been successful, and when the Twenty-seventh Congress was called together by President Harrison to meet in extraordinary session, May 31, 1841, although Mr. Harrison had been succeeded by Mr. Tyler, the condition of the Treasury was such as to require immediate attention. The last reduction under the tariff of 1833 had not yet taken place. Mr. Tyler, who had been professedly a protectionist while he was a candidate, now became hostile to his party interest and gave warning that the compromise act should not be altered except under urgent necessity.

The new tariff bill was not taken up in the House until the 24th of July and was debated less than a week. It was delayed in the Senate until the 27th of August and was passed almost immediately on the 31st. Here it will be seen that it required but little more than a month to enact a tariff law which was really a complete revision, and which took the place of a tariff then in operation. This law, although hastily constructed and passed, was by far the most elaborate bill which the country had known up to that time. It was made up of schedules consistently arranged and the specific duties were equitably imposed on both raw material and finished product.

TARIFF OF 1846.

The tariff of 1846 was framed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Robert J. Walker, of Mississippi. Mr. Walker was a pronounced free trader, and took the very first opportunity which his new position allowed him to start the machinery for the repeal of the tariff of 1842. Under that tariff the country had been exceedingly prosperous since its adoption. Hope revived and industry throughout the country felt a new impulse. The prosperity of the country continued, and, in addition to the increased business activity, the act of 1842 was also a good revenue raiser; in fact, the law was successful in every respect, and there was no reason whatever for its repeal on the ground of helping either industry or labor or the revenue. The reason lay far back of that, and was much the same as the reason for nullification in 1832. The President, who had received the votes of Pennsylvania, and therefore had been elected because he was thought to be a protectionist, at once fell in with the Southern leaders, whose tool he became, and in his message to Congress advocated a change in the existing tariff laws. His Secretary of the Treasury went much further, and in his annual report, dated December 3, 1845, gave to Congress one of the most famous tariff documents ever promulgated in this country. All students of the tariff should read this paper of Secretary Walker, although it can only be referred to here.

The Congress which met in December, 1845, organized in the House by the election of John W. Davis, of Indiana, a free trader, as Speaker, who appointed a Committee of Ways and Means consisting of six Democrats, five of whom were free traders, and three Whigs. A bill was not reported for some time, in fact, not until the middle of April, and it was not considered in Committee of the Whole until the middle of June. The bill was passed by the House on July 3, was placed before the Senate on July 13, and passed on July 28. The final vote on its passage in the Senate is one of historical interest, resulting in a tie, when the Vice-President, Mr. Dallas, elected because he was supposed to be a protectionist, cast the deciding vote with the free traders, making the passage of the bill a possibility.

ELEVEN YEARS OF FREE TRADE.

This tariff of 1846, or the Walker tariff, as it was called, remained practically unchanged for eleven years. A discussion of the merits of the bill, of the changes brought about by its adoption, and the result upon the industries of the country would require volumes and must not be attempted here. It may simply be stated that, abandoning all academic discussion upon the subject, accepting no editorial utterances, but confining ourselves to the news columns of the periodicals of the time, it brought idleness and poverty such as has seldom been known during any business depression of this country; and yet, in spite of this result, made especially apparent during the last few years of the life of the law, in 1857 the tariff was still further reduced, bringing a panic and further destruction of very many of our industries. It has been said that the vote in favor of the tariff of 1857 included many New England Members of Congress and many otherwise known as "protectionists." This is true, for the one reason that the President and Senate were absolutely against the North, and that even the House was Democratic on every issue except the slavery question. The northern manufacturers were not able to get protection for their finished product, and, in despair, they voted for a removal of the duty from the raw material of their goods, which in itself would give them a small measure of protection. The bill was debated from August, 1856, until its adoption on the last of February, 1857, again over six months being occupied in the passage of a bill which was not really a complete revision, but only amendments to another law.

The tariff of 1846, together with its offspring, the tariff of 1857, were in operation for a longer period of time than any other tariff in our history. It was also the longest continuous period of free trade which we have experienced since the foundation of the Government. Its trial was lengthy and thorough, and the result was disaster and ruin. The tariff question, however, was at the time a secondary question in politics and general interest throughout the country. The slavery question was paramount, and became so acute in 1854 that a new party was born, resolved to check the further extension of the slave power beyond the territory of the South. This party, known as the Republican party, did not at first make any attempt at an impossible solution of the tariff question In fact, it was not until the Thirty-sixth Congress, which met in December, 1859, that they had a controlling number of members in either House of Congress. In the House, after eight weeks' balloting, William Pennington, of New Jersey, a Republican, was chosen Speaker.

FIRST REPUBLICAN TARIFF LAW.

Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, was selected as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which at once framed a tariff law upon thorough protection lines, both for the purpose of raising revenue to meet the necessary expenses of the Government and to protect our labor and industries. This bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 105 to 64 on May 11, 1860. When it reached the Democratic Senate, however, it was held up, and would never have been heard of again in that Congress had not several southern Senators resigned their seats in the early part of 1861. After some debate the bill was passed by the Senate on February 20 of that year by a vote of 25 to 14, and it was signed by President Buchanan on March 2. Of this bill and its effect the Annual Encyclopedia for 1861 said:

"A revenue law affording uncommon protection to manufactures was enacted. This was proposed not for the purpose of husbanding the resources of the country in anticipation of approaching strife, but chiefly as a great party measure, and to secure an increase of prosperity to this great national interest. It has proved to be the wisest measure adopted during the session. It immediately checked the importation of foreign manufactures, secured the reduction of the debt of the country to other nations, caused a large importation of specie in payment of exports, and thereby enabled the citizens to advance loans to the Government in its most pressing hour."

This was the first measure enacted by the Republican party, and since the enactment of the Morrill law in 1861, which was framed and enacted solely for the purpose of revenue and protection, the Republican party has steadfastly and continuously advocated and adopted tariffs that have given protection to our labor and industries, and sufficient revenue, together with the internal revenue, to meet the necessary expenses of the Government.

TARIFF BECOMES PARAMOUNT.

With perhaps the exception of the tariff of 1824, there was no time in the history of the country previous to 1880 when the tariff could be called the paramount issue in any election or discussion. Even in 1833, when the compromise tariff was enacted, it was but a portion of the greater issue of disunion. From that time until 1861 slavery and its extension, secession and rebellion so far overshadowed all other questions that, although at times most acrimoniously debated, none ever rose to the dignity of a paramount issue. Following the enactment of the Morrill tariff, and along with the several amendments made necessary by the war and by the condition of the country following the war, the war itself and reconstruction succeeded by our financial adjustments far overshadowed the tariff question.

In 1867 attention was given to the wool and woolen interests, and the increased duty resulted most favorably to those industries. The same was true of the amendments of 1870, which gave great impetus to our iron and steel industries, and especially to the manufacture of steel rails, upon which a specific duty of $28 per ton was placed.

DOWNWARD REVISION IN 1872.

In 1872, however, the reformers and revisionists thought it time for a general reduction, and to appease their clamor a horizontal cut of 10 per cent was made. The panic of 1873 followed, due in part to this reduction. The 10 per cent reduction was repealed in 1875, to the benefit of all industries.

Protection from 1861 up to 1880 had produced sufficient revenue not only to carry on the necessary expenses of the Government, but to enable us to year after year reduce the great debt which had piled up during the civil war. Our industries were flourishing, our country was developing both in manufactures and agriculture, our great railroads were being built, and our coast and lake commerce increased at rapid strides; and yet, in spite of this great prosperity, in spite of the greatest industrial advance and increase of wealth which ever came to any nation in the same space of time, it was found in the campaign of 1880 and the years following that there was a desire on the part of a large number of our people to revise the tariff, and revision then meant, as it does now, reduction.

"FRIENDLY" REVISION IN 1883.

This question was an issue of the campaign of 1880, and although the Republicans and Protectionists won, the desire for revision would not down, and in 1882 so general was the cry that President Arthur in response appointed the famous tariff commission, whose recommendations were largely adopted by Congress, and the so-called "Commission law" of 1883 was framed and adopted.

The report of the commission was presented to the Forty-seventh Congress at its second session, in December, 1882, and the law reached the President for his signature on March 3, 1883. If we include the time spent by the commission in its hearings and preparation of its report, we may charge nearly a whole year of time to the preparation and enactment of the tariff law of 1883. This law remained unchanged until the McKinley tariff of 1890, although during the years intervening the tariff question could be called not only the paramount question in politics and general discussion, but practically the only question.

The election of Mr. Cleveland in 1884 gave new hopes to the so-called "reformers" of the United States, now being encouraged by the free traders of Great Britain, and in 1887 Mr. Cleveland in his message to Congress of that year devoted himself solely to the tariff question, advocating the doctrines set forth by the Cobden Club and the various free trade and reform elements of the United States. The result was the introduction of the Mills bill, a most iniquitous measure, which consumed months of debate in both House and Senate, although it was known that the bill could not possibly become a law. But the message of Mr. Cleveland and the debate upon the Mills bill again led to the tariff discusison during the Presidential campaign of 1888, when Mr. Cleveland was defeated by Mr. Harrison, and a Republican and protectionist House of Representatives was elected to join with the Republican Senate in framing an entirely new tariff law to supersede the one then in operation.

UPWARD REVISION IN 1890.

The Fifty-first Congress met on December 2, 1889, and the House organized by the election of Thomas B. Reed as Speaker, who a week after appointed William McKinley, of Ohio, as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. President Harrison in his message had recommended a revision of the tariff law, and the Ways and Means Committee entered at once upon the preparation of a complete and comprehensive bill. Even with a good working majority in both Houses of Congress, and with a desire to have a new law at the earliest possible day, the McKinley bill did not reach the President until October 1, upon which day it also went into operation. Nearly ten months were spent in its construction, debate, and enactment. But this law was apparently condemned by the people two years afterwards, when they again elected Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency, in 1892, and with him a Congress Democratic in both branches. Although the platform and candidates were pledged to an immediate reform of the tariff and to the enactment of a free-trade law, yet it was August 27, 1894, before the tariff bill became a law, and then without the President's signature. It took the Democratic party nearly a year and a half to prepare and agree upon a tariff law, which when framed and amended and finally passed was not satisfactory to a single Member of either House of Congress, nor to the President, who would neither veto nor sign it. The effect of this law is too recent and too well-known to be more than alluded to here.

FREE-TRADE REVISION IN 1894.

Never before, perhaps, in the history of our country was the anticipation of legislation so keen as in the case of the Democratic tariff law of 1894. Immediately after the election of Mr. Cleveland in 1892, and with him the assurance that both Houses of Congress would be Democratic, the country awoke to the situation and began at once to prepare for it. It was not known what kind of a tariff law would be put on our statute books, but it was known that duties would be reduced all along the line, and that we would have practical free trade for many, if not all, of our industries. The panic which had accompanied previous reductions of the tariff did not wait for the actual occurrence of the reduction of duties. Capitalists, manufacturers, and merchants all knew from previous experience what was to be expected, and so the panic came at once, and continued as long as the tariff continued. Fortunately, the people came to the rescue in the next election, and gave us a Republican House of Representatives, while in 1896 Mr. McKinley was elected, and with him a good majority in both branches of the National Legislature. Again anticipation acted before realization, and just as soon as the commercial and financial interests of the country were assured of protection being restored hope returned and the busy wheels commenced to revolve and employment gave place to idleness, so that when the Dingley law went into operation, on July 24, 1897, after six months spent in its preparation, debate, and enactment, the country was prepared for the busy and prosperous years which followed, and which have continued until the present time.

AVERAGE TIME SPENT IN TARIFF REVISION.

Our tariff history shows, in the first place, that on an average from six to twelve months are required for the preparation, hearing, debate, and enactment of a tariff law. We have also spent many months of hearings and debates on bills which have not been enacted into law. It is always a period of the greatest suspense to all industrial and commercial interests, and this suspense has affected business in the past according as to whether the tariff under debate was to be revised upward or downward. We need not go back to our early history for illustrations of this effect, as they were not so keen during the first half of our history, when the tariff question was not the uppermost subject for discussion, and when industrial development constituted but a small fraction of its present tremendous proportions, as has been the case during the last generation. A knowledge that the tariff will be reduced or increased has much the same effect as does the actual reduction or increase itself. This has been notably the case with regard to our last two laws, the so-called "Wilson-Gorman law" of 1894 and the "Dingley law" of 1897, both of which repealed the tariff then in operation. Till the enactment of the law of 1890 we have had no instance since 1861 of one law entirely replacing another. The various laws during and immediately after that law, the laws of 1867, 1870, and 1872, and even the Commission law of 1883, were amendatory rather than repealing, and so the entire country was not so much concerned as those engaged in industries which were known to be under consideration. But in 1892 and 1893, when it was known that our whole protective principle would be overturned and substituted by a law having for its basis free trade, our people were naturally apprehensive and prepared for the worst; in other words, they prepared for an inundation of foreign goods which would replace our own manufactures.

In 1896 the feeling was exactly the reverse. It was then known that the period of free trade would soon be followed by the enactment of a protective law, and that our own industries and labor would soon have sufficient protection against the competition of foreign mills in Europe and throughout the world.

DISASTER HAS INVARIABLY ATTENDED REDUCTIONS.

The history of our tariff laws shows, too, that in every instance without exception since the foundation of the Government where the existing tariff or any part of it has been reduced there have followed disastrous consequences in all or a part of our industries. There has not been a single exception—not one. On the other hand, it can be said that in every instance where the tariff has been increased as a whole or upon single industries those industries and the commercial prosperity of the country at large have been increased and continued so long as that higher tariff itself continued. This, too, can be laid down as a rule without a single exception.

It must be admitted that during our history there have been reasons for a change in our tariff laws unconnected with the wants of our labor and industries. This has been the question of revenue. Here, again, we have never been in agreement, a portion of our people believing that low duties would bring large revenues. The opposite, however, has been the case. For a time, it is true, low duties might mean a large increase of importations and consequent increase in duties, but as our own idleness and low wages meant a loss of purchasing power, then importations must fall off and duties as well.

It was said that the reason for the lowering of the duties in 1857 was because of our redundant Treasury, and yet our redundant Treasury was not due to the receipt of customs under the Walker tariff, but to the receipts from the sales of public lands; but under the reduced duties of 1857 the revenue fell, as it did before and has since, under purely revenue laws, while, on the contrary, under our protective tariffs our revenues have almost invariably been more than sufficient to meet the necessary expenses of the Government and to decrease our national debt. In fact, one of the reasons for the propaganda of the reformers from 1880 to 1890 was because our revenues were so large as to become almost a menace to good government.

Our history, then, shows that wherever we have reduced the tariff, whether reduction has been brought about by our free traders or by protectionists, it has been more or less disastrous. This was the case in 1816, 1872, and 1883, when the tariff was supposed to be revised by its friends. In 1890, on the contrary, when it was revised by its friends, but when the rates were increased, the results were beneficial, and the years 1891 and 1892, under the operation of this law, were the most prosperous in our history up to that time, the assertions of Democratic orators and free traders to the contrary notwithstanding.

[a] This is the time of actual debate and passage, exclusive of time spent in agitation, hearings, and preparation.

Thus it will appear and will be sustained by proof as strong as proof of Holy Writ that the declaration of Senator Harry Davis in the Senate of the United States many years ago and the statement made by the platform of the Republican party was in spirit and in letter absolutely true not only in substance and effect, but in the details and fullness of statement. It is the imperishable record of more than one hundred and twenty-five years that the American people prosper under high tariffs and suffer under low tariffs, and that accounts for the fact that the Democratic party has been so utterly unable to command the popular sentiment of the American people. Their victories have come when, taking advantage of an opportunity of some character, they have carried away the public mind from the discussion of the tariff question.

And now one further point for the benefit of the gentleman. I take a special interest in this point for he has driven it at me so many times, and I have quailed under it, and I am delighted that at length I am able to meet and turn back the shaft of his wit and argument. He came, he says, pretty near catching somebody here the other day, who, not knowing that the President of the United States in his younger days wrote a eulogy of Mr. Benton—he came very near saying that the writer of that paragraph was a free trader. I denied that. I had heard a great deal about Mr. Benton, and I remembered something about the salt tax. Now, let us see what the statement of the gentleman from Missouri is. He says that Mr. Benton procured the repeal of the salt tax. He will never make that statement again while he lives. He will put a modification to that that will be very significant and very effective. He says that the President, writing of Benton, said Benton did right, or words to that effect, and I said I agreed with Benton and I agreed with the President, and I did that rather hastily. Now, I come to say I offer three cheers for old Tom Benton, who stood away back in 1828 right on the platform and under the crowning principles of the Republican stand-patter of to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.] Let us see. There was no salt manufactured in the United States of any considerable importance, but there was a great trade in meats and fish shipped abroad, and the regulation of the traffic required that the meat of the United States should be packed in what Benton called "alum" salt, which was a foreign product—none of it produced in the United States then and none of it ever produced in the United States since so far as I know. It was salt for the fishermen of New England, because it was to them a source of a great deal of trouble and annoyance that they must pack their foreign-trade fish and meats in a salt that was not produced in the United States, and therefore when we put a tariff on all salt, which we have now in the United States, it of course affected them unfavorably. Now, I will not trouble you to read at any great length what Mr. Benton says about it, but I cite page 154 of the first volume of Benton's Twenty Years in Congress, or thirty years was it——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Thirty years.

Mr. GROSVENOR—

Act of 1790 increases the bounty in lieu of drawback to 10 cents a barrel on pickled fish and salted provisions and 10 cents a quintal on dried fish, the duty on salt being then raised to 12 cents a bushel.

Now, that is honestly attacking the entire salt tariff. That was not wise, because there was an infant industry in American salt, and so gentlemen representing the exporters of American meat and so Mr. Benton attacked the whole of it and failed to repeal the tariff on salt corresponding to American salt.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then your three cheers for Benton which you offered a while ago had a string to them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. I will show you. He starts out with a beautiful eulogy about salt. He says it was taxing an article that God had made and we had to have. Now, Mr. Benton gives nine reasons why he urged the repeal of the salt tax and states directly that he failed to get his repeal so far as the American article was concerned, but he did not fail of getting the tariff taken off alum salt, which we did not produce in the United States, and he states the reason why on page 157, and in that statement he stands precisely where the Republican tariff men stand to-day—a tariff upon things that we produce in this country and free trade in the things that we do not produce in this country, so he cheapened the cost of salt 12 cents a bushel to the man who was compelled to buy the foreign salt and vindicated his correctness at that early period of time as a true and faithful supporter of the Republican idea of protective tariff. I may say under the present law while it is true we have a tariff upon this foreign salt we have a rebate for all of it that is used in the export of fish and meat.

Mr. PAYNE. And always have had under Republican laws.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is right for the New Englanders to have free salt for their fish? That is practically what it comes to. Why is it not fair for the meat producer of the Mississippi Valley to have free salt for their cured meat?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has got a wrong state of facts. He has not got any such question to encounter. The New Englander has no free salt for his fish unless he exports it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Mississippi Valley man has free salt for his meat if he exports it. Both stand equal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How long has that been?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Always. I would advise the gentleman to get the A B C primer on this question and study it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am trying to do so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am coming to another question, and this does not involve the gentleman from Missouri, so far as I know. It is said, and it is said in circles of the utmost respectability, that the Dingley tariff bill was made by the Republican party, but largely as the handiwork of Mr. Dingley, with certain provisions in it, placed there for the purpose of being used for reciprocal tariff with foreign people, and it has been said within a week in one of the most respectable papers in the country, for the hundredth time, no doubt, that Mr. Dingley told somebody that he had put into the tariff a series of high rates for the purpose of using them for reciprocity. Mr. Dingley is dead. If there was one man in this House during the last years of his life whom I honored and admired above any of the others it was Nelson Dingley. And I am going to make a statement, and I am going to make it with some considerable positiveness. I was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means when that bill was framed. I was a member of the Ways and Means Committee, a sort of volunteer organization, that worked all the winter of 1896–97 in the Cochran Hotel making that bill. I was a Member of the House when the bill was discussed and passed. I was a member of the committee of conference that sat for ten days and tried to agree, and finally did agree, with the Senate upon this bill. Mr. Dingley told me on one occasion—and there is another gentleman, at this time not in the House, to whom Mr. Dingley made the same statement—that he had consented to a compromise upon a single schedule of the Dingley tariff bill for a reason which he gave and which I am going to give to you; and then I am going to challenge the world at large to produce one living man that ever heard Dingley say anything different than that. There is a long discussion over this question of sugar, and I am glad it has come up here and that it is pertinent to the discussion which I am making. No man was more anxious to promote the interests of the beet-sugar men than was Mr. Dingley, and during the whole of that contest his heart was in the battle for this new industry. Without the action of Dingley and the men who made that tariff there would not be a beet-sugar factory in the United States to-day. He was the man who made it possible for the beet-sugar growth that we have had in this country; and I am going to read from his own language to show you that he understood he was doing the best that could be done for the industry at the time.

Now, the question was a question of differential; and I might say if I was elsewhere than in the House of Representatives we came very near having a very bitter condition of things growing out of the discussion of what ought to be the differential between raw sugar and refined sugar. What is the differential, my beet-sugar friends? Why, it is that which stands between you and bankruptcy.

You talk about joining the Democrats on the other side of the House to repeal the differential. Some day you may happen to do that, and the Senate may take you, as the representatives of this great industry, as in earnest about it and agree to the proposition of the House, and when you do, it will not be twenty-four hours until a petition in bankruptcy will be filed by every beet-sugar factory in the United States. What is it? We say there shall be a certain tariff put upon raw sugar. That does not affect you only indirectly. Then we say, in order to countervail the prices that the American sugar trust can sell this sugar at, we will put the differential upon refined sugar, and you get the benefit of it. Now, you want to break up the sugar trust, do you not, by repealing the differential? Why, you are both under the same umbrella. You are exactly alike in interest. The destruction of one is the destruction of the other. Take off the differential and let the two-thirds of the products of the world in refined sugar come into this country free of duty, or with as low a duty as upon raw sugar, and you will be wiped out. It is the differential that protects you, and yet you would think to hear some of these gentlemen talk that the Republican party was the enemy of this sugar, and that we had abandoned you to the wiles and torments of the sugar trust.

Now, let me go further. After this controversy has raged for quite a while—and there are no less than eight of the gentlemen who were present on that occasion still living—Mr. Dingley held a conference at the hotel, in which a long interview was held between himself and a member of the sugar trust at that time. He is not connected with it now.

I was present during the whole of that long, hot afternoon, and next morning Mr. Dingley said to me, "I think the best we can do will be to consent to the compromise that was offered us last night (or yesterday), for," he said, "they seemed determined to insist upon it." That was the differential. "They seemed determined upon it, and we shall want a pretty high tariff on sugar in order that we may enter into reciprocity with Cuba or Spain or South American countries that produce sugar."

Now, that was Mr. Dingley's statement. He made it to Mr. DOLLIVER afterwards, and I have the authority of Mr. DOLLIVER, given to me yesterday, to quote him, so that I am backed by the statement of Mr. DOLLIVER in the statement which I make, that the view expressed by Mr. Dingley as to any other articles especially selected for reciprocity were put into the Dingley tariff bill in the form of the articles themselves that were to be the subject of reciprocity.

Why, Mr. Chairman, do you think Mr. Dingley was that character of man that he would in the first place specifically name the articles, as he did, as you will find them in the Dingley law, which he enumerated that might be used at a certain reduction, and yet had it in his mind or made an utterance that he had purposely placed high rates here in order that he might put them down for reciprocal purposes?

Now, so much for the Dingley incident, except that I want to read to you what Mr. Dingley thought he had accomplished. On page 2707 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fifty-fifth Congress Mr. Dingley said:

> The House differential between raw and refined sugar and the general features of the House schedule have been preserved, and the Senate amendment increasing the differential to one-fifth and reducing the duties one-tenth on sugars of 87° and below (which would have made a difference of thirteen-hundredths between 88° and 87° sugar) have been rejected in conference. In deference to the wishes of those interested in beet-sugar production, the Senate rate of 1.95 on refined sugar has been retained as an encouragement to that industry, but the duty on raw sugar has been increased seven and a half one-hundredths, precisely the same as the increase on the refined, so as to leave the differential between the raw and refined at the initial point of 100° the same as in the House bill, and secure so much additional revenue.
> To meet the objection that the House bill provided for larger equivalent ad valorem duties on the lower than on the higher grades of sugar, the conference agreement commences with 75° at ninety-five one-hundredths of a cent instead of 1 cent, and then raises the duty on each degree of raw sugar from three one-hundredths to three and a half one-hundredths, so that when the one hundredth degree is reached the duty will be 1.82½ and the duty on refined 1.95, leaving the 12½ differential between raw and refined sugars of 100° test, as it stood in the schedule which passed the House.
> Under the bill as it passed the House the duty on raw sugar of 100° purity would be 1.75, and the duty on refined 1.87½, leaving twelve and a half hundredths differential at this point. Under the conference schedule the duty on raw sugar of 100° purity would be 1.82½, and the duty upon refined sugar 1.95, leaving the differential at this point precisely the same, 12½ cents per hundred, in both schedules.
> By this arrangement the revenue will be increased about two and a half million dollars on the sugar schedule, because the increased duty has been placed not simply on refined sugar (as proposed by the Senate), but also upon raw sugars, the point where revenue will be received; and those who are endeavoring to develop the production of beet sugar in this country will have seven and a half hundredths greater protection than they would have had under the bill as it passed the House, but the differential as between refined and raw sugars will remain precisely the same at the 100° point.

Showing that this very Dingley law was fought over and fought for, and ultimately sustained and passed by the great author of the bill for the express purpose of rescuing and supporting the growing industry of sugar. Now, gentlemen have been standing here on the floor and talking about joining the Democrats and repealing the differential. When you do that and destruction has come to this industry, and the evil effects of your votes are felt, you may go home to your constituency; you can select your burial places and your tombstones, and you may put this inscription on them: "Traitor! Fool!" Laughter.] You can not go back on an industry of that character for spite; you can not undertake to talk to the people in that sort of way, or the people of this country will very shortly take your attitude and say that you do not value the present condition while you seek to destroy the industry you claim to defend. You will not do any such thing.

One other topic, and then I am through with this long speech. It is said that Germany will not trade with us. I am going to put into my speech a statement showing that Germany's trade to-day is better with us than ever before, and——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are not our exports to Germany at the present time, and even for the last three or four months, greatly increased from the very fact that that tariff there is going into effect in March? Is that not a fair conclusion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There may be an inference of that kind drawn from the situation. The Germans are a pretty shrewd people, and they buy where they can buy the cheapest and best. I have no fears that they are going to be troublesome to us; and if they were, I am one of the kind of American fellows that believe that we should take care of ourselves and let other people take care of themselves, if they see fit to do so. That is my doctrine. [Applause.]

Here is a newspaper clipping which I vouch for as containing the exact official figures of our trade with Germany. They speak in louder tones than the cry of the fearful. It must be borne in mind that the more prosperous times are the larger the consumption of breadstuffs among the American people, and the fact that our breadstuff exports to Germany have fallen off only indicates the value of our home market:

TRADE WITH GERMANY—THAT COUNTRY SECOND AMONG OUR FOREIGN CUSTOMERS—IMPORTS FROM THERE WERE $118,000,000 AND EXPORTS $194,000,000—BREADSTUFFS FELL OFF.

Trade between the United States and Germany, whose commercial relations are now the subject of negotiations between the two Governments, aggregated in the fiscal year 1905 over $300,000,000.

A report issued by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor says:

"The imports from Germany were $118,000,000 in value, and exceeded imports from that country in any earlier year. The exports to Germany were $194,000,000 in value, and exceeded our exports to that country in any earlier year except 1904, in which the total was a little over $214,000,000, this decrease in 1905, compared with 1904, having occurred in raw cotton, and being altogether due to a fall in price, since the quantity in 1905 was greater than in 1904. Imports from Germany increased $37,000,000 in the period from 1895 to 1905, and exports to that country increased $102,000,000 in the same time.

GERMANY STANDS SECOND.

"Germany stands second in the order of magnitude of our trade with foreign countries both as to imports and exports.

"Manufactures are the bulk of the $118,000,000 worth of merchandise imported from Germany. These manufactures include cotton goods, about $14,000,000 in value; chemicals, drugs, and dyes, $15,000,000; iron and steel manufactures, about $4,000,000; leather manufactures, $3,000,000; silk manufactures, about $5,000,000; manufactures of fibers, about $3,000,000; woolen goods, $3,000,000; paper, and manufactures thereof, over $3,000,000, and toys, $4,000,000.

"Raw cotton is by far the largest single item in our exports to Germany, amounting in 1905 to $87,000,000 in value, as compared with exports of $43,000,000 in value in 1895. The increase, however, is due in part to the general advance in the price of cotton. Lard exports to Germany in 1905 amounted to practically $15,000,000. Exports of provisions of all classes, including lard, amounted to $21,000,000, against about $13,000,000 in 1895.

BREADSTUFFS FALL OFF.

"Breadstuffs form a less important factor in our trade with Germany than formerly, owing to the great falling off in the quantity which the United States is now able to spare to the outside world. Of wheat, for example, our exports to Germany, which amounted to more than 10,000,000 bushels in 1901, and practically 20,000,000 in 1902, fell to fourteen and one-half millions in 1903, seven and one-half millions in 1904, and 100,040 bushels in 1905, the value in 1905 being but $84,760. Flour shows also a considerable decline, but corn showed marked increase, its total export to Germany being over $9,000,000 in value.

"In manufactures, especially copper, mineral oil, leather, scientific instruments, and certain manufactures of iron and steel our exports to Germany show a steady growth. The value of copper ingots, bars, and plates exported from the United States to Germany amounted to over $14,000,000, against a little more than one and one-half millions in 1895, the record year; kerosene, eight and one-half million, against four and three-quarter millions in 1895; leather, one and one-half million dollars, against over a million in 1900; cotton-seed oil, practically one and one-half million dollars, and oil cake, five and three-quarter millions, against less than $1,000,000, and less than two and one-half millions, respectively, a decade ago. Imports from Germany formed, in 1905, 10.7 per cent of the total importations into the United States, and exports to that country, in the same year, 12.8 per cent of the total exports of the country. Germany's figures show that imports from the United States in 1904 formed 14.8 per cent of her total imports, and that exports to the United States formed 9.5 per cent of her exports."

But, in the language of Patrick Henry, as nearly as I can remember it, "In the midst of all this rejoicing there comes up a wail from Massachusetts." [Laughter.]

The best trade we ever had in the world is now. Wealth is accumulating beyond the dreams of anybody. Every man who wants a job has got a job and is at work, and his wages have increased in the last ten years more than 30 per cent. The cost of his living has been increased, too. And who get the cost of his living? My friend from Connecticut over there was worrying about the tobacco worms of the Connecticut Valley. His farmer friends that he so ably and truthfully represents are getting the differentials between the former cost of the workingman's living and the cost of his living to-day.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. By the grace of Mr. Dingley, assisted by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. By the grace of God, if you please, and of Mr. Dingley. I do not care how you fix it. But now here comes Massachusetts. I am sorry for Massachusetts. I wish I could do something to cheer her up. I want to know what kind of people they have down there. That is in New England, you know. I was born in New England and I am proud of the fact, and I thought New England was in pretty good shape.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. New England is proud of the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am very much obliged. Now, I hold in my hand two copies of the Boston Herald of two several dates, six months apart—one in July and the other in January. I shall not weary your patience now, but I am going to put in my printed remarks a few exuberant extracts from the statement of the Boston Herald, a free-trade, occasionally Democratic, occasionally any other kind of a "cratic" newspaper that they have in Boston. I do not think I could fairly say that it is a party newspaper, but I believe it usually supports the Democratic ticket. I do not think it would misrepresent on that account. It is a strong, able, and fair paper. I find here, among other things, something which happens to come in just in point on this question of the tariff on hides. I quote from the heading:

Boston great leather center; only second to London as a market for this product; reaches out for raw material to every part of the world; Massachusetts' commanding position; improvements new machinery have introduced.

Then at a later point in the same article they speak of exports of leather and manufactures thereof from the United States during the calendar year 1904, which amounted to $35,000,000, as against $23,000,000 from the United Kingdom; and during the first quarter of the calendar year 1905 the exports of these articles from the United States amounted to $9,000,000, as against $6,000,000 from the United Kingdom. Then it goes on to speak of the amount of leather that they export.

Now, where do they get their hides? It tells here. They get them from all over the world. It sounds like a Peter Parley's geography that I studied when I was a boy to read the places where Boston reaches out and gets hold of hides of every description. Fine grades of Persian sheep and goats—Turkey sends goatskins, and the whole Asiatic continent exports to this market a great variety of goat and sheep skins. Russia sends an enormous supply of colt skins, one house alone importing over a million hides. Good Mohammedans slaughter colts for meat, and so the hide is made an article of commerce, and it goes right into Boston. Now, what happens? Boston makes it into leather of all kinds; and there is a statement here showing the tremendous exports of this leather, not only manufactured in the greatest home and beehive of manufacturers in all the world, but they send abroad enormous shiploads of manufactured leather. Do they pay any duty on that? They get it abroad and they bring it in, but they get a drawback of 99 per cent, and they are growling here about one cent and a half additional tax on hides. Why, Mr. Chairman, the very birds that sing in the trees of Boston Common attune their melodious voices to the refrain of the protective tariff. There is not a stone in the monuments that grace the beautiful city of Boston that is not the product of a protective tariff. If I was to select one place above all others that has levied contributions in the form of tariff duties upon all mankind, I would locate that place in the city of Boston and in the State of Massachusetts. [Applause on the Republican side.] They have grown rich and powerful, the greatest merchants in the world, the greatest manufacturers in the world, and one third of all their wealth has come since the Dingley bill was placed upon the statute books. And in this great morning of glory, when we are all happy, we hear the voice of John Hook hoarsely crying through the American camp, "Hides! Hides!" [Laughter.]

In the Boston Herald of Sunday, July 16, last, we have the following statement:

Up to the end of the first quarter of the nineteenth century the business of Boston was almost entirely commercial in its character. Its wealthy and successful merchants were shipowners and importers, but at about that time the business of manufacture received an impetus and those Boston merchants who had been importers of merchandise from England and France and from the countries bordering on the Mediterranean and Baltic seas began entering upon the work of domestic production.

And then appears this statement, speaking of the distances of the sources of raw material in certain manufactures from Boston, or from Massachusetts, perhaps:

This has been very noticeable in the manufacture of steel and iron, many concerns engaged in the manufacture of the heavier products having moved away, but, notwithstanding this, the iron and steel industry has shown a marked increase in Massachusetts, both in the number of persons employed and the value of its products, although the number of concerns decreased from fifteen to eight during the ten years preceding 1900. On the other hand, there was an increase of nearly 1,000 in the number of persons employed, and the value of products increased from $11,201,149 to $13,491,159, or 20.4 per cent. The increase has come almost exclusively in the manufacture of fine tools and delicate instruments.

Here, let it be said, that this branch of industry in iron and steel is heavily protected by the Dingley bill.

Then follows this:

New England makes the greater part of the spindles and looms used in the cotton mills in the country, and almost as great a proportion of the machinery used in the woolen mills.

Here, again, comes the protection which makes that industry highly profitable. Speaking of the industries of Massachusetts, they say:

In its twenty-one leading industries, including 5,570 establishments, or 19.1 per cent of the total number in the State, there is an invested capital of $578,812,222, giving employment to 332,232 wage-earners, and paying in wages $143,868,269.

The textile industry, which is the most important of all these, has experienced a change in recent years. Massachusetts has for some years led all other States in the manufacture of worsted goods, and within ten years the worsted has exceeded the manufacture of woolen goods. There has been a wonderful increase in the amount of machinery and spindles in the worsted mills, and the manner in which this State has gone ahead in this direction is shown by the fact that while the increase in spindles in the worsted mills of the United States as a whole has been 81.6 per cent, in Massachusetts it has reached 110 per cent.

Here, again, is the schedule of the Dingley bill; woolens and worsteds highly protected, and strangely enough, Mr. Chairman, no man has risen on the floor of this House nor stated in the campaign in Massachusetts, so far as I have heard—certainly no Republican—that he demanded a reduction in the tariff on woolen manufactures and worsted goods. Now comes this:

Massachusetts leads the country in a number of important industries, and the manufacture of boots and shoes is one of the most interesting. Figures already given show the magnitude of the business, but these do not include the totals of some of the allied industries, such as boots and shoes cut stock, which show an increase in the value of products of $2,315,272. The rival centers in this industry are Brockton, Lynn, and Haverhill. Cincinnati is fourth in rank in the shoe cities of the United States, and Brockton's products in 1900 exceeded those of the Ohio city by $11,055,973, or 125.8 per cent.

In the issue of the Boston Herald of Sunday, December 31, 1905, we find this:

BOOTS AND SHOES.

The factory manufacture of boots and shoes ranks, according to the last census report, as second among the industries of the State, with 640 establishments, 58,645 wage-earners, and products valued at $117,115,243. In 1890 there were 1,057 establishments, 67,374 wage-earners, and products valued at $116,387,900. In 1900 Massachusetts ranked first in the United States in the factory manufacture of boots and shoes—a rank it had held for many years. It manufactured 44.9 per cent of the total value of the factory boot and shoe products of the United States, while the State second in rank, New York, turned out only 9.8 per cent of these products.

Speaking of the relative growth in Massachusetts of the boot and shoe business, we have the following:

Although since 1850 Massachusetts has held her own, with about 45 per cent of the total production of boots and shoes in this country, the business has increased enormously throughout the other States. In 1850 the value of the total production in this country was $54,815,948, and of this Massachusetts had $24,102,366, or 44 per cent of all. In 1890 the value of the total production in the United States was $220,649,358, and of this Massachusetts had $116,387,900, or 52 per cent. In 1900 the total value of these products was $261,028,580, and of this Massachusetts's share was 45 per cent

Thus you see, Mr. Chairman, that the highly educated, thoroughly competent, wise business men of Massachusetts stay with an industry that puts into their hands at this time 45 per cent of the total manufacture of the boots and shoes of this country and the ever-increasing percentage.

Now, about leather. I quote again from the Boston Herald of December 31 last:

Cowhide leather is cheaper than calf and it has several finishes and grades. Cowhide is the leather for the millions. It supplies the need of the man or woman who wants a heavy shoe made of durable leather. Cowhide is still made with the bark oil, and there has been no change in recent years in the method of tanning it. The demand for this kind of leather has not been affected by changes in the market for other leathers. Much of it is exported to England.

Boston's business in sole leather is larger than that in cowhides, and has been variously estimated at from $25,000,000 to $40,000,000 a year. The sole-leather headquarters of the country is here. Like cowhides, sole leather is still tanned by the old-fashioned bark process. As in other heavy leathers, Boston does a heavy business in export of sole leather. But in leather Boston has found its best market in this country. Foreign trade has not been put aside, but there has been little need of making vigorous attempts to secure it. Germany and other countries are now buying American leathers, as do South America and Mexico.

Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that upon every pound of this leather the duty paid upon the raw material of hide is refunded in the finished product of the leather to the exporter.

Exports of leather and manufactures thereof from the United States during the calendar year 1904 amounted to $35,000,000, as against $23,000,000 from the United Kingdom, and during the first quarter of the present calendar year those from the United States amounted to $9,128,837, as against $6,425,911 from the United Kingdom. Of the exports from the United Kingdom of leather, amounting during 1904 to $23,146,383, the larger portion was unwrought leather, tanned or dressed, the exports of which amounted to $8,320,000; the next largest item was boots and shoes.

Of our own exportation of leather, it is in various forms. The principal articles for the calendar year of 1904 were largely unworked leather. The United States leads all countries in its leather exports and in the amount consumed at home. And Boston is the center of the market.

In the recent address of Governor Guild, with pardonable pride it is said, he called attention to the high commercial and industrial rank of his State.

We are met in no mean city—

Said he.

This is the second seaport in the United States. Both exports and imports exceed those of last year.

Continuing proudly, as it is said, in praise of his State, he used the following language:

Massachusetts, fourth from the foot in area, is seventh from the top in population, fourth from the top in the annual value of her manufactures, and third from the top in the annual amount paid in wages. Measured by assessed valuation of the property in her borders Massachusetts is exceeded by but two States. Fourth from the foot in area, Massachusetts is third from the top in wealth.

The annual value of the manufactured products of Massachusetts increased by but $175,173,033 between 1885 and 1895. It increased by $300,267,558 between 1895 and 1905. The total value of goods made in Massachusetts was $1,150,074,860 in 1905. The increase in the value of the annual product of cotton goods from 1885 to 1895 was $32,190,463. From 1895 to 1905, in spite of southern competition, it was $38,949,280. The increase in our wool and worsted products between 1885 and 1895 was $7,400,533. Between 1895 and 1905 it was $50,581,514. The increase in our shoe product between 1885 and 1895 was $7,405,548. Between 1895 and 1905 it was $70,271,966.

On October 31 the total amount on deposit in our savings banks was, in 1885, $274,998,412; in 1895, $439,269,861; and in 1905, $662,808,312. The increase in the last decade was greater by over $58,000,000 than in the decade that preceded it. In 1885 the average deposit for each person of population was $141.64; in 1895, $175.69, and in 1905, $220.67. The gain in deposits per capita in the last decade was greater by nearly a third than the gain in the preceding decade.

From a recent report of the shoe and boot business in Massachusetts, dated as will be seen:

EASTERN SHOE TRADE—SHOWS A HEAVY INCREASE OF BUSINESS COMPARED WITH LAST YEAR.

[Special dispatch to the Enquirer.]

BOSTON, January 14, 1906.

The Boston boot and shoe market has taken on an active appearance. Shoe manufacturers are rushing to their full capacity, in most instances on spring goods. The majority have a large volume of orders booked, and as buyers increased their purchases from 10 to 40 per cent over those of a year ago manufacturers do not look for any large volume of supplementary business. As these shoes begin to be shipped out, and as the wearing season approaches, however, manufacturers look for some new business.

The shipments for the past week have amounted to 96,736 cases, as compared with 85,671 cases during the corresponding period a year ago, showing a gain of 11,065 cases. The shipments to Cincinnati were 3,318 cases, to Cleveland 939 cases, to Columbus 1,039 cases, to Milwaukee 847 cases, to St. Louis 13,028 cases, and to New Orleans 2,531 cases.

The leather market has shown more activity this week than for some time. Shoe manufacturers are showing samples for next fall and, feeling that prices of leather will be no lower, are placing orders for supplies for future delivery. This demand is taking up some of the surplus of heavy weights that was beginning to be seen. New orders of fair volume for immediate delivery are also reported and at full prices. Calf leathers are very strong in price and offerings are not large. All tanners are badly taxed to make deliveries on old contracts, owing to the short supply offering. The strong demand for patent-leather shoes keeps all grades of patent leather closely sold up, and also creates a strong demand for mat calf for toppings.

Side leathers are in better call. Satin is beginning to attract more call from abroad. Kangaroo side is in good demand and tanners owe large lots on old contracts. Glazed kid is in active demand and dealers report that they are getting an advance on some grades. The call for sheep leather is very fair at firm prices.

The hide market is quiet. Western buffs are held at 13 to 13¼ cents. Bids of 13 cents for No. 1 Ohio buffs are refused. Extremes are quiet at 13¼ cents. Southern green salted hides are in large offering at 12 to 12¼ cents, but the demand is dull. Calfskins are scarce and in good demand. Foreigns are in smaller offering than for months.

This was a most splendid statement of the situation. Now, I turn from a governor happy to a governor misled, and Governor Guild adds to the glowing description just stated the following wail:

Through the conventions of her two great parties, through her general court and governor, Massachusetts has already demanded from the National Government the immediate construction of a tariff framed to meet the lines of modern competition. Massachusetts asks the removal of such duties as are now needless; the reduction of such duties as were once just, but are now excessive, and the development not of our commerce alone, but of the commerce of the United States by more friendly trade treaties with other nations.

And this, too, when he shows that our shoe products increased only $7,405,548 in the single year, and adds that during the past decade the increase has been $70,271,966.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will ask the gentleman if he is aware of the fact that under a Republican tariff the Sandwich Glass Works, the Suffolk and New England Glass Company, the great furniture factories of Cambridge, the South Boston Iron Works, the Norway Iron Works, and the Gilmore Rolling Mills, of Cambridge, all went out of existence?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I am not aware of that; but I am aware——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then I am glad to increase the gentleman's store of knowledge.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I am aware that at Pittsburg and Wheeling and all up and down the Monongahela River, and everywhere else where iron works and glass works are carried on upon proper principles, they have grown rich, and enormously so, under this very tariff law; and if you have a condition of things where your raw material can not be transported from the Allegheny Mountains, why wind up, as a matter of course, buy Government bonds, so you need not pay any duty, or go down there and operate where business is good.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If we had had free raw material, these iron works and glass works would have stayed in Massachusetts.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman, for the gentleman to make a speech. I do not want to seem discourteous to the gentleman and I will reply to what he has said. They would not have had any glass works, they would not have had any market for the iron, they would not have had any market for the glass, but they would have been where they were in 1857 if it had not been for the Dingley tariff law. My friend is not so ingenuous as to attempt to claim that even under the Wilson bill the prosperity in New England was like the prosperity now.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The works I have spoken about were established in the early part of the nineteenth century, and they all went out under the high tariff.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I presume that their system of manufacture was such that under the improved conditions it made them useless and put them out of business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want the gentleman from Tennessee to cut me off from the answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he favors the reciprocity features of the Dingley tariff bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, that is an academical study. Let us devote a whole day to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did not the gentleman from Ohio vote for that feature of the Dingley tariff bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; I voted for the Dingley tariff bill. I was not proud of that feature then, and I was glad to see it go out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman favor its reenactment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Because I do not want to interfere with this flood tide of prosperity. [Laughter.] I do not want to go to throwing chunks into it. I went down to the State of Tennessee and there I met my friend on his native heath, like Macgregor, and where he sat was the head of the table [laughter], and I do not want to interfere with the prosperity there that my friend will always testify to when he is not making a political speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One other question. Does not the gentleman remember that when we were framing the Dingley tariff bill thirteen nations of the world protested against it as being unfair to the foreign markets, and that if it was enacted they would retaliate, and, as a matter of fact, have not they retaliated more or less?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If they have, I hope they will keep it up right along. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have they not retaliated?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has not England put up the tax on tobacco in retaliation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Have we grown any the poorer for it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio wants ship subsidies to encourage the hauling of our produce to foreign markets.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We don't want to haul off all of it; just a little. Mr. Chairman, the difference between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself can be put into a very small compass. He is living on his prophetic genius for evils to come; I am reveling in the joys of the present. [Great laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; the gentleman from Ohio is always reveling; he is always at home under any circumstances. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us get back to Boston. I appeal to Boston and Massachusetts to stand firm. I want to give them some simple advice that Dickens puts into the mouth of one of his characters. I won't undertake to name him for a certainty, but I think it was Captain Cuttle, who advised little Walter, with tears in his eyes, in a most affectionate way, "Never go back on them as brought you up by hand." [Great laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit an interruption there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In a second. Therefore I appeal to Massachusetts and to Boston and all New England to never go back on them as brought them up by hand. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman admit that New England has been brought up by hand through Government aid?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; under God and the Republican party. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to recognize the unusual magnanimity of the gentleman from Ohio—unusual for him—in naming God this once as the senior member of the firm. [Great laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, a word in conclusion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I don't want to interrupt the gentleman's peroration——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I haven't any peroration. I don't make them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman is through with Massachusetts and the Republican tariff reformers——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; I am through with Massachusetts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask a question about this salt business. I want to get it straight in the RECORD.

I understood you to say that the Massachusetts and New England fish are cured with imported salt?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is in the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not certify to that, but that is my understanding—for exportation purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And they have a drawback on that equal to the whole tariff on salt?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, the meat raisers have a drawback on foreign salt if they use it, but, as a matter of fact, they do not use foreign salt.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is their misfortune.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it is not their misfortune. Here is a question I want to ask you. If the New England fishermen use imported salt in packing their fish and get a drawback on it, and the American meat producer uses American salt in curing his meat on which there is no drawback, then does not that give the Massachusetts people and the rest of the New Englanders an absolute advantage over your people and my people and the people of the Mississippi Valley who raise meat? That can not be waived by the A B C business.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to read that clause of the Dingley Act?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will be glad to have the gentleman do so.

Mr. PAYNE. It is paragraph 284, which reads as follows:

Salt in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, 12 cents per 100 pounds; in bulk, 8 cents per 100 hundred pounds: Provided, That imported salt in bond may be used in curing fish taken by vessels licensed to engage in the fisheries, and in curing fish on the shores of the navigable waters of the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; and upon proof that the salt has been used for either of the purposes stated in this proviso, the duties on the same shall be remitted: Provided further, That exporters of meats, whether packed or smoked, which have been cured in the United States with imported salt, shall, upon satisfactory proof, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, that such meats shall have been cured with imported salt, have refunded to them from the Treasury the duties paid on the salt so used in curing such exported meats, in amounts not less than $100.

That same provision in substance was in the McKinley law, and was knocked out in the Wilson law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York before he sits down——

Mr. PAYNE. I could get up if the gentleman from Ohio will yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think we had better have it out on the salt question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is true, and it is true, that the New England fish are cured by imported salt on which we have a drawback to the amount of the tariff that they paid, provided it is exported, and the American meat producer cured his meat with American salt on which there is no drawback, where is the advantage he gets by any drawback? Is not that language about the western meat raisers' drawbacks on imported salt, which they do not use, put into that bill as a mere makeweight in order to confuse the public mind and cover up the advantage which New England gets from the exported salt which the other does not get?

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman when this clause was put in the Dingley bill there was a statement that meat packers did use this salt, and I have always understood they did use foreign salt and get the drawback. If they declined to use it and did not take advantage of the law, of course we can not compel them and do not compel them, but they did not have under the law any more advantage for fish than they did for meat.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the salt question is settled, I will go on.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask either the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], it does not make any difference which, does not this tariff on foreign salt put up the price of American salt?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think it does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you think the meat raisers of the Mississippi Valley are big enough fools to go to the Atlantic coast and import salt from foreign markets to cure their meat when Kansas and that whole country out there is rammed chock full of American salt, where all you have to do is to dig it out of the ground in carload lots?

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to my friend from Missouri when I was a boy on the farm my father always considered it necessary to have Turks Island salt to cure his meat with. Whether that condition has changed now or not I do not know.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is three-quarters of a century ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I am much obliged to the gentleman; I confess to half a century, but three-quarters of a century I decline.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, before I conclude, let me finish this salt question.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Let me make one remark. I would like to say to the gentleman who has been talking about salt that the reason the factories of the Mississippi Valley use American salt instead of importing salt and getting the benefit of the rebate is because the American salt is so much cheaper they can not afford to use the other.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is not the reason. It is because the American salt lies at their very doors, and that makes it cheaper. It saves freight charges. There are whole counties in Kansas underlaid by salt hundreds of feet deep, and all you have to do is to quarry it out, as easily as you can quarry marble in the State of Vermont.

Mr. PAYNE. If it had not been for protection it would not have got in there.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not? There is not a country on God's earth that can compete with Kansas in the production of salt.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, Mr. Chairman, when I was a boy——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was about a century ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). I remember going with my father in an ox-cart conveyance nearly 30 miles to trade wheat for salt. That was in good old Democratic times. It was in 1846 or 1848, or somewhere along there. We bought a barrel of salt containing 5 bushels and gave for that 12 bushels of wheat. To-day, in the district in which I live, you can buy a barrel of better salt than that was, in good cooperage, for 65 cents. Now, if the gentleman wants to make a fuss about salt, I advise him to estimate as nearly as possible how much salt it will take to be the equivalent of the tariff on one hide, and go into a compromise to repeal the duty on the hide and on the salt and see how he would come out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Ohio state, with the great reputation which he has at stake, that this reduction in the price of salt, what he has stated it was when he was a boy down to the present low rate, has been produced by the tariff, and that new machinery and the appliances and the new methods of production of salt have had no effect in reducing the price of salt?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is not a great deal of machinery involved in the making of salt, but there are scientific improvements very greatly used. The production of salt was never important until the tariff stimulated the men engaged in the industry, and then I confess it has gone away beyond the effect of any protective tariff, and the present duty on salt is totally immaterial so far as the cost of salt is concerned, in my judgment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask him whether the operation of a drawback is not always to enable the American manufacturer of the article concerning which there is a drawback for raw material to sell cheaper to the foreign consumer than to the American consumer? Is not that its necessary result?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The question of its purpose and of its result are two different propositions. It certainly has something to do with getting rid of the difference between the delivery at the place of manufacture and freight to the place of foreign delivery.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. In other words, does not it make the article cheaper to the foreign consumer, freight left out of consideration, free on board at the place of shipment, than it does to the home consumer?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No doubt.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, that being the case, will the gentleman tell me what becomes of the old time-honored and well-beloved Republican principle that a tariff is a tax on the foreigner?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is too profound a proposition for so short a time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This seems to be a tax on the home man and a bonus to the foreigner.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The object of the rebate on raw material brought into this country, manufactured and exported, is in order to give the laborer a cheaper raw material than possibly he could get at home. It is done wholly and entirely in the interest of the labor of the United States, and does not benefit the manufacturer, so far as I can see, in any degree whatever.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed with about two minutes of my speech, and then I will be through.

Mr. Chairman, this is a great question. This is a question that will reach out into the future; it is a question that is important in the present. It has been confided by the people of the United States to the disposition of the Republican party, and there is no member of the Republican party—I say it with profound respect for every one of you—there is no member of the Republican party that in his individual capacity knows more about what ought to be done than does the Republican party as an aggregation of statesmen and patriotic men; and I appeal to the Republicans on this side of the House to stand together as one man and not permit ourselves to be raided by the sophistry of Democratic disorganization. The Republican party has never failed in one of its great enterprises, and time will fail me to take them up one by one to prove to you that from its birth in 1853, all along the line of its magnificent pathway, it has never undertaken to do anything in politics, in civilization, in business, or any question of any other character that in the long run it did not achieve the result for which it started. This is not a time, in the very heyday of the glory of the country, to disrupt the Republican party because of slight differences of opinion upon minor questions of policy. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, we have just listened to another of those well-known Republican speeches upon the tariff question which illustrate the aptness of the Latin adage, "Qui ambulat in tenebris, nescit quo vadit." Whoever walks in the shadows is ignorant beforehand of the point at which he is coming out. The closing part of that speech illustrated the fact that when a tariff bill fails it benefits the American people. The object in imposing a tariff is to raise the price of the article upon which it is imposed. If the tariff be imposed for protection, whenever it fails to do that, then the object of the protectionist has failed, and then the protectionist in due course of time comes before the American Congress and boasts of its failure as one of the blessings of protectionism.

The gentleman has just shown that American salt is so much cheaper than foreign salt that American meat curers use it all the time. He has proved that the object in laying a protective tariff upon salt has failed, and then the gentleman congratulates the country upon the benefits which were derived for the consumers from cheap salt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if a man were to attempt to dam up a stream and were to discover afterwards that the stream had dug itself a new channel around the dam with a current as strong as ever, and were to come in and boast that he had created an additional current, he would stand in just about the attitude that the gentleman stands.

Mr. Chairman, let us get our bearings. I want to talk about these particular bills. What is the choice of the House to-day when it comes to the question of fixing the commercial relations between the Philippine Islands and continental United States or the balance of the United States? We stand with a majority bill before us, and I am glad to welcome as its advocates among the Democratic following in this House the Agamemnon of the Republican party, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]; old Ulysses himself, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and young Achilles, perhaps with a vulnerable heel, but nothing else vulnerable about him, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Colorado was right when he said these gentlemen even in advocating their own bills were following in Democratic footsteps. We have been for years trying to drive the Republican party to the very position which this majority bill now expresses, and what strikes me as curious is that there are some few men upon this side of the Chamber who, when we have succeeded in bringing them to that position, want us now to quit driving because they are about to do what we have been trying to make them do for years. One proposition before the House is the majority bill. What is it? It is a recognition of the Democratic claim that all parts of the common domain of the United States ought to have free trade with one another. The majority bill recognizes free trade now in every product except two, and then it says that on and after a certain day in 1909 we shall have free trade between these two separate parts of the common domain of the United States in all products, these two products included.

That is one bill before you. It recognizes the Democratic principle of the relation that ought to exist between the Federal Government and a remote province, colony, appendage, territory, appurtenant appendage—I care not what you call it—a domain under the flag of the United States. It is Democratic because Democracy is Americanism, and Americanism had its birth in the assertion of the principle that the mother country had no right to make one set of laws for Englishmen in England and another set of laws for Englishmen in America; that Great Britain had no right to make discriminations against her own subjects in America in favor of her own subjects in the mother country. It is Democratic for that reason.

It is Democratic for another reason. Leaving out of question the relationship that ought to exist between different parts of the common domain, it recognizes the grand old Democratic principle that the freer you can make commercial relations between the different congeries of the human race the better for commerce, the better for mutual enrichment and the greater benefit you have conferred upon all, especially the wage-earner. Why, Republicans in this debate speak of a reduction of tariff upon American goods going into the Philippines as "a benefit to the Filipino." So it is, but that is Democratic talk. My friend, the gentleman from New York, amongst others, says this, and yet if the Republican theory be correct then the higher tariff you can put upon American goods going into the Philippines the better for the Filipinos.

How glad I was the other day to hear my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] elucidating and clarifying the good old Democratic doctrine that cheap labor is not always low-priced labor, that a man may be hired very cheaply per diem, per week, or per month, and yet his labor may be a very dear labor, because it is dearer per yard, per pound, or per bale of product. But, Mr. Chairman, whenever a Republican intellect, being an American intellect, can for the time being divorce itself from some special interest or partisan purpose it immediately begins to clarify itself, and it begins to understand a whole lot of things that it either theretofore has not understood or else concerning which its possessor has pretended not to understand.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the majority bill here is one thing, the minority bill is another, and unlike the majority bill, the minority bill goes the full logical length and is the consistent voice of the minority. The majority bill is not the consistent voice of the majority. Well do I remember when we had this same question up in connection with Porto Rico that a great Republican President, well-bred gentleman that he was, uttered the words that "manifest justice" and "plain duty" required that we should give Porto Rico free trade with the balance of the United States. And well do I remember the time, not long after that, when the cohorts of tobacco and of sugar and of rice and of Heaven knows what else crowded upon the city of Washington that a different voice came, not so publicly, from the surroundings of the same personage. Well do I remember that there was a bill about to be produced from the Committee on Ways and Means giving the balance of the United States free trade with Porto Rico, a bill about to be reported by the leader of the Republican side, the chairman of that great committee. Well do I remember that a little bit after that, when the cohorts had won their way to the Republican heart, as they usually somehow do, that a bill was introduced by the same gentleman to fix duties upon articles coming from Porto Rico, and then well do I remember that, having forgotten about our "plain duty" and "manifest justice," as far as that bill was concerned, some months afterwards the same voice of consistent Republicanism came in with another bill finally giving free trade with Porto Rico. And during all that time the grand old historic party, select though few it may have been in various Congresses, has stood upon the historic American doctrine that it is not right for any mother country to float its flag, inscribed with the pretenses of its liberties and privileges, over a people without giving them the common benefits of the Government under which they live. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have done the same thing about the Philippines. We have tried to drive you in every minority report as near the position that we now occupy as we could. We have driven you now to where you say that in 1909, anyway, you are going to be with us all over, and that now you are with us except in two spots, a sugar spot and a tobacconized spot. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there is another bill before this House, and that is the present law, the present tariff existing between Porto Rico and the Philippines. It is on the statute books, but it is as much before us for reenactment as if it were to-day for the first time propounded. Let no Democrat deceive himself. You can not vote so as to avoid the truth of the old law and common-sense maxim that "every man is responsible for the natural and necessary consequences of his own conduct." The man who votes against the substitute bill, or after the substitute bill shall have been voted down, if it shall be—and I heartily hope that it shall not be—the man who votes against the majority bill after that is not only voting against something, but he is voting for something. He is voting for the existing tariff between the United States and the Philippines and between the Philippines and the United States. He is consciously and deliberately voting for its reenacting as his choice, rather than for its disenactment or repeal.

When his conscience concerning the constitutionality is so delicate that he can not swallow a rate of 25 per cent of the Dingley rate upon tobacco and sugar, even though it be a remnant after reduction and even though all duties on all other articles be repealed, he will have to go back and explain how that same delicate conscience could swallow all of the present existing tariff rates between these two parts of the common domain. He can not plead any doctrinaire excuse. He has got to plead before common-sense people in a forum of common sense, and their inquiry will be: "Did you not know when you voted against the bill that you were voting for the existing law, and if your objection to the bill was that it is unconstitutional in two respects, to wit, as to sugar and tobacco, how can you justify yourself in voting for a bill that was unconstitutional in every respect?" [Applause.]

If a great, big, strong fellow, like my friend, Mr. RUCKER, of Missouri, were to come up to me some night and poke a pistol at my head—and in his particular case I think his fist would be sufficient—and say, "JOHN WILLIAMS, you have got $100 in your pocket, and I want it," and I surrendering to the sight of the blue metal of the pistol barrel, what would be thought if my friend the other gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] should come up about that time with power to help me, if seeking to use his influence with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] to give me back my money—all of it—after talking with him a while and getting the consent of Mr. RUCKER to give me back $75 of my money, Mr. RUCKER pleading, whether falsely or not, that he "really had need of the other $25"—what would be thought of it if my friend Mr. CLARK said, "Well, RUCKER, I can not stand by that sort of an agreement, because if I stand here as a witness to your keeping $25 of the money of JOHN WILLIAMS, I am a party to the original robbery—particeps criminis in the entire affair." [Laughter.]

Now, that is the question before this House. The gentleman from Colorado was right when he said that both of these bills are Democratic. One—ours—is altogether so. The other—that of the majority—is really altogether so. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] was right when he said both of these bills are Democratic. I am glad to see, now and then, a Republican Administration having a lucid interval and recommending good old American doctrine born in the throes of the American Revolution to the American people. [Applause.]

I am glad to see the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] applaud the sentiment that the American President ought to recommend good old American doctrine to the American people, [laughter], that American doctrine having already been stigmatized or complimented by him as Democratic in its character.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] did not go quite far enough back. He might have gone back to the Porto Rican bill; he might have gone back to the first bill upon the question of commercial relations with the Philippines. I do not want to discuss that now. Here is one thing that I do want to say in connection with this question: I do not believe that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in connection with these insular cases was good law until, of course, after it had been made, when it does become good law, whatever else bad—ethics or whatnot—there may be in it.

A decision of the Supreme Court does not change the right of a case; it does not change the ethics of the case. If you were to ask me now, in view of that decision, what was the legal relationship between the Philippine Archipelago and continental America I would answer that I did not think fourteen Philadelphia lawyers could answer the question. But if you asked me what the ethical relationship between us and those islands in our occupancy—temporary, I hope in God's name—my answer would be that a child with common attributes in its heart could tell you what the ethics were—the duty to give them equal opportunities, the duty not to allow our Government to be solely a burden upon them, but to let it be, in as far as it naturally may be, a benefit as well as a burden. The Supreme Court decision could not change the right, it could not change plain duty, it could not change manifest duty, it can only make or change law. It ought to confine itself to declaring law; but under the pretense of declaring it does sometimes, and in my opinion did in this case, make law.

Now, I expect some of you will be surprised to hear me say that I am glad they gave the decision. If they found that in their conscience they could do it—it is not a conscience burden of mine, I was not one of them—I am glad, because when they failed to decide that the Philippines were eternally and forever and under all circumstances and conditions altogether and exclusively domestic, because we can not hold colonies; when they decided in words almost that Congress had the right to do anything that Congress would as regards the relationship between us and them, they in substance decided also that Congress had the right to get rid of them whenever Congress chose. This power, in my opinion, it would have had anyhow. The power under treaty to acquire carries with it the power by treaty to release, unless the territory has in the meantime become a State. But many did not agree with me about that. Get rid of them? Why? For their sake? Yes, but not mainly, but for our sakes more than any other. Gentlemen, I speak with feeling upon this question. All of us in the cotton States, where there is an overwhelming population of another race, speak with feeling upon it. The American who can read American history and can not discover that almost every great national trouble we have ever had, every great problem seemingly unsolvable that we have been faced with, has grown out of the presence in the same country of two different, unassimilable races, and races are never assimilable except by legal intermarriage and by a recognition on the part of one of the absolute equality of the other; the man who can read American history and not discover that the landing of the first ship freighted with Africans at Jamestown was the beginning of all our woes, or nearly all of them, is too weak in his intellect to be required to read history at all, too weak to be expected to learn any lesson whatsoever from it.

It is one thing, when a common negro selling Yankee ancestry and a common negro buying Southern ancestry have given you the problem, to deal with it bravely and well with a first and just regard to the integrity of your own race and the ethics which underlie the civilization of that race, but it is a different thing to go across the sea, to do this of your own accord—of your own accord, with eyes opened by past experience, to annex and permanently nurse by retention another race problem. Not of God's accord. Curse the hypocrisy of the fellow who tells us "God put us in the Philippine Islands." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nobody but a hypocrite says it. There is nobody but a fool who believes it. We had 10,000 men at sea going to the East before we signed the treaty which took them because we knew we were going to take them, and we knew we would need soldiers for them when we did. We bought them and knew we were buying a war when we did. "The devil came out of his study, and, quoth he, 'the best way to do my will is to call it the will of God.'" American greed sent us there; American appetite for prestige and conquest sent us there; American pride and appetite to go "world-powering" sent us there. We went there of our own accord. There was not a moment after we went there, even the very moment after the blessed sun shone upon the victory of Manila that we could not have left, and the first opportunity was the best. I am glad the Supreme Court has left us a way to get rid of them at some time. You can get rid of them at some time. There are a hundred ways. Any one of them is better for us and our children than staying. If you gentlemen, whose special industries are faced with real or fancied injury, want to defeat this legislation, if you want to defeat legislation like it in the future, get rid of the Philippine Islands and you will always find when you come to the Democratic doctrine that it is un-American to hold crown colonies, a solid Democracy over here to help you, including cane sugar, beet sugar, rice, tobacco, and everything else. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When I say get rid of them, I do not mean the "scuttle doctrine," as the gentleman from Pennsylvania called it. If I want to leave a house I would not leave the house with all the doors wide open and all the windows wide open without finding a proper man to take my place to handle the keys and see that burglars did not enter. There is no trouble about the way to get rid of them. We have ourselves shown the way in the case of Cuba.

Something has been said about the function of a minority. I will tell you what in my view is the function of the minority, and especially in a House like this, where the minority can initiate nothing, can accomplish by its own votes nothing, and can only vote. Whenever anything comes from the other side of the Chamber that is wrong, oppose it. Whenever anything comes from the other side of the Chamber that is right, vote for it. There is no way to serve the minority better than to remember the good old adage, that he serves his party well who serves his country best, and he serves his country best who serves the right whatever the right may be. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I mentioned a moment ago——

Mr. KEIFER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's discussion, and I only want the gentleman to give the credit of that which he has attempted just now to quote. Will you please tell us who is the author of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not remember, but I think Edmund Burke, while he was not the author of the exact words, was the author of the sentiment. I have not attempted to quote the exact words.

Mr. KEIFER. The first time it got into our history and politics was when it was put into an inaugural address by President Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear that so old a sentiment coming from such a distinguished source as Edmund Burke received the approval of Rutherford B. Hayes. [Laughter.] In the opinion of everybody acquainted with both historical characters it adds immensely to the value of the maxim.

My friend Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts was asked while upon his feet: What will the Republicans do about the tariff? He replied, as I am informed—because I was not in the Chamber at the time and have not read the RECORD—"I am not a prophet." Now, my friends, I am not a prophet, either, but I believe from the clouds now in the skies, the direction of the wind, and all the balance of it, that a man need not be a weather prophet to answer that question. You are going to do nothing about the tariff. The Republican party in its present decadent condition has neither the brains nor the intelligence to remedy tariff abuses. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the reason why you are going to have a Democratic House of Representatives after the next election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, a few stand-patters, with absolute contempt for popular sentiment and absolute trust in the omnipotence of the Committee on Rules, and in the Committee on Ways and Means, and in our little legislative coteries here in Washington, may imagine there is no outside world. There is an outside world in Michigan, in Wisconsin, in Iowa, throughout all the great Middle West, whose world market for their wheat and corn and meats and agricultural implements is being menaced by the initiation of a commercial warfare by the Emperor of Germany in retaliation for our spirit of commercial exclusiveness. There is an outside world up in Massachusetts, although, as the gentleman from Ohio said this morning, Massachusetts was "brought up by hand" on the tariff. There was a bottle of governmental pap given to her early, and all she had to do was to suck. She owes her predominance in the Union, so far as wealth is concerned, to the fact that her statesmen all had the shrewdness to mold tariff schedules to suit Massachusetts and to suit New England.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one word more and then I will.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it so happens in this world that no patient can exist long in a healthful condition upon the same medicine, no matter whether it be governmentally administered or not. The time will come when the thing that was formerly a medicine will become a poison. Massachusetts now is crying out for a revision of the tariff. Changed conditions have brought it about that she feels the burdensomeness of her part of the payment of tariff taxes. It is not nearly as nice as having the other fellow pay the tax while she collected. God bless her! I am glad to see her back shoulder to shoulder with old Virginia, as she was early in the history of this country, and once more recognizing Democratic principles. Massachusetts did not go into the tariff willingly. It was forced upon her by the West. Her great statesman, Daniel Webster, made a speech against it, a speech which even he, the "godlike Daniel" himself, could never subsequently answer and which nobody yet has answered. At that time Massachusetts was a navigating State, and desired to remain one. But when they put this iniquitous system upon the statute books, Massachusetts, amidst her rock-ribbed hills, with her magnificent intelligence, her superb courage, her excellent adaptiveness, said "All right; that is the law of the country and we will proceed to take advantage of it, and when it comes to molding schedules we will mold them to suit New England. Let the southerners, with their sentiment and their oratory, go; let the westerners, with their patriotism, loud-mouthed, pass by; we will pay attention to schedules."

And New England paid attention to schedules and for a long time had her way about them, no matter what party was in power. Now some of them have come to be awfully inconvenient, and she wants to get rid of such of them as are inconvenient. Pennsylvania and the West got to "fixing things." Very well; may God bless you to our ranks. We will help you to get rid of them; we have been robbed, too; but "when you come into a court of equity you must do equity." There is one power in the world that can rid you of the inequity of your part of the burden, sharing even in present conditions, and that power is the Democratic party.

But Massachusetts has helped to take some of the tax off the Kansan's mower and reaper—they are his raw material, his tools—off the blacksmith's hammer, the carpenter's saw and nails, the steel rails necessary for the development of our internal commerce, and the Mississippian's cotton gin, bagging, and ties.

Massachusetts says she wants "free hides." I have offered a bill reducing the duty on hides to 5 per cent, a reduction of two-thirds; the duty on sole leather to 7 per cent ad valorem and to reduce the balance of the leather and harness and shoes schedule and leather-glove schedule 50 per cent. Surely you are willing if the duties on your raw material be reduced 66⅔ per cent to reduce the duty upon the finished product 50 per cent. I have, with the view again of trying your Republican friends, introduced another bill, to put hides on the free list, provided you will reduce the balance of the schedule a little more than 50 per cent. When you come into a court of equity, do equity. If you are to get a reduction on your raw material, in the name of Justice let the millions who must wear shoes and whose wives and children must wear them get them for a less part of a day's wage. There is no more honest, no more intelligent part of this Union than the young Democracy of the State of Massachusetts; and it is going to win its fight because the Republican party has not the courage—I said brains a moment ago; I believe I will take that back—it has not the courage to disturb this protective chain-armor suit. Why not? Because your several pocket receipts from the system are all banded together like one of those old-time sets of armor that the knights wore, plate by plate, riveted together, and the minute one chain broke the whole armor fell to pieces.

That is what you are afraid of; and yet a certain Sir Robert Peel in England, who was a protectionist and found himself in such a situation, had sense enough and courage enough to go at it, and go at it gradually, not to dynamite the whole thing, but gradually to bring about a successful issue out of a false position. You say that you are afraid that we Democrats, if we try it, will dynamite and blow up the house in order to build up another house. Well, if so, then for God's sake, if you think as you speak, revise this tariff yourselves. Remove its excrescences, remove its injustices, fix it so that no American manufacturer under its ægis and shelter can longer sell goods cheaper to the foreigner at a good profit while he exploits the American consumer at an unreasonable profit. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Do that; do it yourselves, I say. I am so much an American rather than a Democrat I would rather see it done by you than that it should not be done at all; and if it be true that we can not do it without dynamiting all the industries of the country—that proposition I deny—but if I believed it, then I would rather see you do it than to see us do it. You say you are the party which "does things." Do something. You are afraid. You are afraid of finding yourselves in the attitude of freebooters at daggers' points about an equitable division of the spoils. We used to say about the Republican party that it might be guilty of every sin in the world, but that it did not lack courage and it did not lack brains. That was when you called yourselves "the party of moral ideas." Now you have only schedule ideas. Now you have got down to the point where you lack courage, and I begin to mightily suspect that you lack brains.

It is one of God's ordinances that people who know they are wrong and yet are held back by thoughts of profit and worldly welfare from remedying their wrong are generally lacking in both.

Some of the arguments made in connection with this question amuse me a bit. I beg pardon; I promised a moment ago to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. That would involve the gentleman's returning to a part of his argument that he has left, and he afterwards corrected the impression which he gave my mind in the statement that he made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was about New England having originated the protective policy. New England did not do it.

Mr. MCCALL. Yes; it was the statement in which he referred to New England as practically the originator of the protective tariff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; New England was not; but New England took advantage of it after it was originated and devoted her attention to schedule making for several generations, much to her own enrichment, until it is strictly true, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said this morning, that she "was brought up by the hand" of the Federal Government.

Some of these arguments amuse me by their own inconsistency. A gentleman gets up and says that if we let sugar in from the Philippines cheaper than it is now the Philippine producer will get nothing by it; that the American consumer will get nothing by it; that the American sugar trust will get everything by it. Then, in the very next breath, the same gentleman says if we let sugar in from the Philippine Islands at a reduced tax it will encourage and "develop the sugar industry in the Philippine Islands" to such an extent that virtually all of their arable lands will go into sugar.

The next man tells you that the Philippine tobacco farmer will not get anything out of the bill; that it will be of no benefit to him; that the tobacco trust will get it all; and then, in the next breath, he tells you—forgetting about the necessary small plats of land that are due to be put down in sugar by the prophecy of his colleague—that virtually the whole arable land in the Philippines will go into tobacco, so much more money will be made in the archipelago out of that product. And, by the way, some of my friends seemed to be frightened the other day for fear all the arable lands in the Philippines would go into rice "to the ruin" of Texas and Louisiana rice planters. Great heavens! Mr. Chairman, picture the two things, will you—the Filipino, half naked, suffering with anæmia, driving a water buffalo as his motive power, with a sharpened stick for a plow, 6,000 miles away, with freight rates to pay, and a Texas or Louisiana planter with the most magnificent supervising intelligence that the agricultural world has ever known, with all modern machinery, upon an immense great place! Picture my friend the Texan or the Louisianian driven out of business by the half-naked Filipino with the water buffalo and sharp stick!

But that is not all. If they placed it upon that basis alone we might "sort o' stand for it;" but he is not to do it directly, but to do it indirectly, by shipping out his own rice, half fed as he is, with no money in his pocket, shipping out his own rice to America while he buys from China and Japan the rice to feed himself and his family and keep alive while he is waiting for the remittance for his own rice that has to be sold. What a wonderful industrial foresight and ingenuity is attributed to this poor half-naked Filipino, who is not fit to govern himself or to go to the dickens by himself, whichever you choose, in the opinion of the Republican party. He grows rice to eat, and he makes so little of it that he has to import some, and yet he is to be such a modern financier on the rice question as to be entitled to a diploma to serve as a president of a great life-insurance company. He is going to send his rice here, over 6,000 miles, and pay all the freight on it, after it has cost him more to make it with his water buffalo and his sharp stick, to compete with this rice, raised in this beautiful country, in Texas or Louisiana, with the magnificent intelligence there for its supervision and with magnificent machinery for its cultivation, and meanwhile he is to do without something to eat until he can get his rice sold or else is to negotiate a meantime loan at oriental rates. That little brown fellow lives on a farm of about 6 or 8 or 10 acres and raises his rice in the water; not the way they raise it down here, but trusting in Providence for the water to come; not by means of irrigation canals upon which thousands of thousands of dollars have been expended. And he is frightening my friends from Louisiana.

Why, take courage from us—the cotton planters of Louisiana and Mississippi and Texas and the Carolinas! We have never had a dollar of protection from any human being in the world, and I do not want my children and my grandchildren to work under the ægis of any protective tariff, even if I could make more money in my lifetime by it or some of them make more in theirs. Why? Because they would become accustomed to a protective-tariff margin of doing business, and any set of politicians at any time could withdraw the margin. Having contracted a different habit of doing business and a different standard of living, when the withdrawal time came, although it ought not to ruin them, it would ruin them. The very cotton business of this country to-day, if we were doing business under a protective tariff, would be ruined to-morrow by the withdrawal of the protective tariff. Why? Because part of our standard of living, perhaps, would be a month or two in the summer at the seaside or in the mountains and a week or two at the St. Charles, in New Orleans, in the winter, and our wives and daughters could not get used to the change of régime in time to keep us from being ruined.

Thomas Jefferson was right in saying that "pride costs more than hunger, thirst, and cold."

I say, take courage from us. We have faced in competition the fellaheen of Egypt; we have faced the Hindoo—

> Who for pants makes his skin do—
> God bless the poor Hindoo.

Both work for very little money. Through the supervising intelligence that has brought the cotton-raising industry to the highest point of perfection we have faced them all successfully, and will continue to do it until the crack of doom. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] said yesterday, "Find a man who has nothing and produces nothing and you find a man who is by nature a free trader." Let us analyze that a bit. The man who has nothing can buy nothing, and therefore he does not care a cent what it costs. It is the man that has something to buy with that is interested in getting his goods at a fair price. The man that has nothing does not care, and it does not pay him to care, because he is reduced either to stealing or to begging, and either one of these processes is a free process. I can give the gentleman something that will reply to that, and it happens to be true: Find a man that is not willing to stand up alone and fight the world in fair competition and without governmental prop or assistance, relying upon the rich soil and the neighborhood of a great people and a magnificent area of a free trade among communities hitherto unequaled in the history of the entire world, stretching from Canada to the Gulf and from the Atlantic to the Pacific; find me a man who is unwilling, who is afraid, who is not brave enough, relying on his own intelligence, industry, and courage, to stand up without governmental prop, without governmental crutch, or governmental shelter, but who wants to be made prosperous at the expense of other people, by governmental assistance, so that he can make other people pay him a tax for the product which he raises, and I will find you a man that is a natural-born protectionist. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That definition is not a joke; it is true.

But, Mr. Chairman, how pitiable is the obtrusion of all these little selfish pocketbook interests in connection with the solution of a great question of humanity on trial in the forum of the mother country when that question is, Shall we do justice by the colony? Why, even Great Britain does not exploit her colonies for the benefit of Great Britain any more. Her own bone and sinew—and, thank God, they were ancestors of nearly all of us that wore the colonial uniform which reenforced the argument—her own bone and sinew taught her better than that in the war beginning in 1776. And the very people who taught Great Britain that lesson are now to follow foolishly, if not wickedly, in the current of the policy which she pursued.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Is it not a fact that every country in Europe producing beet sugar places a duty upon cane sugar imported from its own possessions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether that is so or not, but if it is, it is a demonstration of the folly of misdirected energy. Whenever any country undertakes to bring into existence an industry which is not naturally prosperous, purely by the taxing power, and keep it dependent on the taxing power, they have taken that much capital and that much labor out of some other channel in which it might be more wisely directed. This is especially true if under the same flag there is land which will raise sugar cheaper for the consumption of all the people to whom the flag belongs. In addition to the unwisdom of the proposition is the unrighteousness of it, because the other fellow, who is pursuing the natural profitable avocation, has to pay the bill. I know Great Britain puts no duty on cane sugar made in her colonies. I do not know that Germany has any colonies that raise cane sugar. France has some. There is nothing, by the way, more absurd than the war that Europe has had for I do not know how long between different countries competing with one another in the raising of beet sugar until it absolutely got to this status: Austria-Hungary and Germany and France, raising beet sugar, encouraged it by a bounty on exports, which was, of course, deducted from the price of the purchaser in the foreign country to which the goods were exported, until they were selling to the great market of London sugar from all those countries at about 30 per cent less than their own people were getting it for in their own country; and, finally, having raised one another's bounties to a point of absolute absurdity, they had sometime ago to hold a beet-sugar convention and agree on reduction of bounties all along the line. In other words, Austria-Hungary, Germany, and France each was taxing itself to death in order to sell sugar cheap to the English market.

Now, that is an absolute historical fact. It is not a piece of irony; it is not a piece of sarcasm. It is not the plot of a comic opera. Men in some future age reading that may think somebody as a burlesque had written it, but it is a matter of history. My friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] had Clew's circular read, showing how this country had prospered under a protective tariff. I believe I noticed that he used the preposition "under," rather than the preposition "from," but I think he meant "from." That it has prospered under a protective tariff there can be no manner of doubt; that it has prospered from a protective tariff there is all sorts of doubt, and Clew's circular itself settles the doubt, because if you listened to its reading it went on to state the magnificent crops of cotton, the magnificent crops of wheat, the magnificent herds of cattle browsing upon all our hills, the great exports of agricultural products, unprotected, bringing to our American shores gold from every clime until it has made us a very rich country. But I am not one of those who are going to be absurd enough to deny that we and the balance of the world owe our chief blessings to the Dingley tariff. I am sometimes accused of being ironical. I remember, down at a little place in West Virginia, notifying a Democratic nominee for the Vice-Presidency, I had occasion to notice the peculiarity of the present Chief Executive which leads him to extol the arts of war while he regards peace as a sort of sloth breeder, and during the course of my remarks I took occasion, as I thought, ironically to agree with him, and said: "Who was the fool who said 'war is hell,' anyhow? He could not have been acquainted with any real war like the President and I are. He must have been an amateur in war. Whatever you do, Mr. Vice-President, urge the President who will be elected with you to pray for war as a manhood breeder and a preventive of sloth." Well, I did not know that I had overargued the matter so far, but some time after that I got a letter from an old Confederate soldier down in West Virginia, who said:

> I have been watching your career with some degree of interest, and I have liked you up to the time you made that speech, but when you say that war is not hell you do not know what you are talking about. [Laughter.]
> I was in the war for four years. It is hell on men, it is hell on women, it is hell on children, it is hell on business, it is hell on morals, and, my boy, do you not make the mistake to think it is not.

I wrote back to him and tried to explain I had not precisely meant all that I had said to go without any salt of humor in it at all, but I never did succeed, and I have been informed the old fellow does not admire me any more because I did not recognize the horrors of war. Now, then, having made that statement, I am going to show you, gentlemen, how much the Dingley tariff has benefited Canada during the same length of time that it has taxed us into prosperity, and I am going to show you that it has benefited Canada more than us.

I am not going to deny that the Dingley tariff is responsible for all the prosperity in the world. I am not going even to put God in the firm as the senior member, as the gentleman from Ohio this morning reluctantly did. I am going to admit that the Dingley tariff has not only made the United States, but Canada and the Argentine Republic and Mexico and pretty nearly all the balance of the world more prosperous right at this moment than they have ever been in their history, and has brought about in a period of a decade at least and something over an unparalleled march of industrial progress throughout the world. I know the Dingley tariff bill did it, because it did it here. I know the Dingley tariff bill is responsible for the fertility of the valleys in the Argentine Republic, because it has raised my cotton for me in Mississippi, while benefiting me all along the line by making me pay higher prices for the plows and machinery that raised it, for the gins that ginned it, for the clothes that my laborers wear while they pick it, and for the stuff I put upon my back while I was engaged in the industry, and for the nails and lumber of their cabins. Let us see. Just before us here is the Dominion of Canada, and in the November number of the Review of Reviews, year 1904, I find the things which I am going to read to you in an article on page 574 by Agnes C. Laut. Listen to me. Oh, the wonders of the Dingley tariff just across the border. I read:

Ten years ago Canada was buying only $56,000,000 worth of American goods. To-day, despite the raise in the Canadian tariff, $125,000,000 worth of American imports yearly enter the Dominion. Canada's exports to Great Britain represent almost the same, doubling at a bound in ten years; and the entrance of 20,000 immigrants in 1894 has gone up to nearly 154,000 in 1904, of whom 50,000 are Americans, citizens of the United States.

What is the index of the comparative prosperity of two countries? That people with common sense leave the less prosperous of the two in order to seek prosperity upon the shores of the more prosperous of the two. Why is it that for a hundred years Europeans have been coming to the United States—Irish, Scotch, English, Welsh, Germans, Scandinavians, Italians, Hungarians, and Slav? Because they can find here the prosperity they could not find comparatively at home. And here are 50,000 immigrants of what sort? Loafers on the streets? No. Hoodlums? No. They are American farmers. Where from? The Dakotas, Iowa, and some of them from Missouri. The Dingley tariff did this for Canada. Let me go ahead:

A good feature of this immigration is that the settlers have money, and many of them are even American capitalists seeking fields of investment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may happen now and then in the opinion of a financier that a farmer or laborer is simply a fool, and that he has gone to the wrong place because he did not know any better. But it never happens that a "capitalist" is a fool. He is going to the right place because he knows it is better.

Let me go on with this:

Receipts on the Canadian Pacific Railroad have almost reached the million-a-week mark and a second transcontinental road is being built.

Yes; and receipts upon the Canadian Pacific Railroad will go on and on and on, growing in comparison with American railroads, taking the same direction upon the other side of the border as long as your miserable steel schedule permits the steel trust to sell rails to Canadian railroads being built to compete with yours at $7 to $9 a ton less money. There is no longer any denial of the fact, from any Republican campaign orator even, that this has been done, that the Great Northern Railway itself bought for so much of its track as lay in America steel rails at $28 or $29 a ton, and for so much of its track as lay in Canada steel rails at $21 a ton; that the Mexican National Railroad bought steel rails for so much of its track as lay in Texas at $28 and for so much of its track as lay in Mexico at $20 a ton. In that far, at any rate, the Dingley bill did have something to do with Canadian prosperity in no Pickwickian sense. Let us go on:

For five years crops have been phenomenal; the phenomenal crops, with dollar-a-bushel wheat.

Oh, how fondly gentlemen rely upon the increased price of American agricultural products brought about by the Dingley bill, wheat among other things. Well, the Dingley bill increased the price of Canadian wheat just exactly as much as it did American wheat, and undoubtedly, therefore, is responsible for the wheat farmer's prosperity in Canada.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he knew how much less wheat sells for now in Alberta or Manitoba, or how much less it is than the wheat at the mills of St. Paul and Minneapolis?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, my heavens! the gentleman might as well ask me how much less cotton sells for in Yazoo City, Miss., than it does in New Orleans or New York, or Fall River, Mass. Of course it sells for less the farther off it is from the mills.

Mr. KEIFER. This is the point, Mr. Chairman. Does it not sell for substantially less in those portions of Canada—that is, measured by the 25-cent duty now upon wheat?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It sells for less in Manitoba and Alberta than it does in St. Paul or Minneapolis, of course. I do not know how much less it sells for. It sells for less in Manitoba and Alberta than it does in Quebec and Montreal, and cotton sells for less in central Mississippi than it does at Fall River, Mass.

Mr. KEIFER. But, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, I desire to know how it is affected by the 25-cent duty on wheat on the bushel?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not a particle.

Mr. KEIFER. That is your claim.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not a particle, and for the simplest reason in the world.

Mr. KEIFER. One of the greatest mill men in this country or any other has recently testified exactly opposite to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The greatest mill man in the world might testify until he was blue in the face and he could prove just this, that wheat is worth more in densely populated countries and large cities and near flouring mills than it is in a remote farming country, with freight rates to pay and maybe bad roads; and he can not prove anything beyond that. The man who asserts that the price of wheat, which is an export article both from Canada and the United States, and whose price is fixed in the markets of the world, can be controlled either by a Canadian tariff or a United States tariff is too ignorant of economics to be heard to testify about anything. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me? I only want to get at the truth. The fact is that much of the wheat lies along the line of Canada much nearer to the Pillsbury mills in Minneapolis than the wheat that is brought there and paid a higher price for from farther west. It is not a question of distance, but a question of the 25 cents duty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is undoubtedly true, all except the reason you give; and it is also true that there is a great deal of American wheat lying nearer to Canadian mills than to any American mills and that the American wheat will sell for less where it is than the Canadian wheat will sell at the Canadian mill. Of course, when you say to a man across the border, 10 miles from a mill, "I am going to make you ship your goods a hundred miles to the Canadian mill," or when the Canadian government says to an American 10 miles from a Canadian mill, "I am going to make you ship 100 miles to an American mill," you do decrease that man's price for his wheat at the farm by the difference of the freight which he has to pay increased by the bungled influence of Government. But you do not raise the other man's price for his wheat one cent, nor do you raise the price of your own country's wheat in the Liverpool market one mill. The price of the wheat is the same in both places; but there has been a deduction from the price of the wheat for the higher freight to the distant mill than to the near mill.

Now, let me go on. I find here in this same review another article headed, "Western Canada in 1904," and it is written by Theodore McFarlane Knappen. Listen to this, on page 578:

In the last fiscal year the foreign commerce of Canada amounted to $473,000,000, an increase of $6,000,000 over the preceding year, and of $233,000,000 over 1894.

Two hundred and thirty-three million dollars increase out of a total of $473,000,000!

The imports were $253,000,000, of which $143,000,000 were from the United States.

This little country—little in population—now has a foreign trade one-fifth as large as that of the United States, which has fourteen times as large a population.

Even the old balance-of-trade men do not contend now that what you ship and sell to somebody else is not that much prosperity, though some of them deny that you are ever benefited by buying what you want. The total, at any rate, of the foreign trade of Canada is one-fifth as large as that of the entire United States, who have a population fourteen times as large. And that was all brought about by the operation of the Dingley tariff, because one of the curious things about a protective tariff is this: That it is put up as a barrier to keep foreign products out, and yet whenever the foreign products come the Agamemnon and the Ulysses and Achilles and the new knight of the Republican party discover that the importations come not in spite of the tariff, but because of it. The tariff is the only thing in the world that can work beneficially both ways. You put it on to raise the price, but if the price should happen to fall in spite of it, why then it is "a benefit of the tariff." You put it on to keep out imports, but if the imports should happen for any other reason to come, then it is "due to the tariff." Oh, what a remarkably consistent party you are here, you worshipers at the shrine of protectionism! You are putting up a barrier to keep the products of the earth from coming in and feeding and clothing our children instead of letting them come and adding nothing to their price except the necessary tax that would carry on a magnificent government on true American lines. You put up a tariff for this purpose, and then you go down to the Isthmus and spend $600,000,000, or whatever it will be before you get through, to cut a ditch in between the two oceans, so that these products you have purposely raised the value of can come in cheaper. Then you subscribe to a great project, to have something in the character of a great American commercial marine, not for the purpose of cultivating, but of defeating "the just and equitable and beneficent effects of the Republican protective tariff"—a merchant marine to let the products that you have barred out come in cheaper, to carry the products that you have legislated against letting come in.

At one time you cry: "A bas the products of foreign pauper labor!" At the next moment: "Tax the people to build ships to bring them in, and to dig canals to bring them through. The more we can raise the tariff tax to keep them out the better. The more we can lower the transportation tax to let them in the better."

You give reasons for tariff taxing in the name of "national prosperity" and in the name of "labor." They are not your reasons, my friends. Your reason is that some one along the line puts money in his pocket by it. Do not ask too closely whom.

Sir Walter Scott says in one of his novels, The Antiquary, I think, that there was a Latin adage floating around among the deer stealers of the Scottish border. It is not very good Latin, but it is a very good adage. The adage was "Non est inquirendum unde venit venison." [Laughter.] Not to inquire too closely whence the venison comes. The secret at the bottom of your whole system is the secret of not inquiring too closely whence the money comes that goes into the pocket of the fellow that you make prosperous, not by his intelligence, not by his exertion, not by fair play between him and his fellow-citizens, but by a governmental crutch, by governmental hothousing at my expense and at the expense of the poor darky who works my cotton. Somebody said to me the other day, "But are not your darkies pretty prosperous now, and you too?" Yes, we are; but we are a good deal less prosperous than we would have been if you had left us comparatively unfilched. A man may have a hundred thousand dollars a year and be robbed of $25,000 and still be a pretty rich fellow, because he has got a very large plant and a very large income; but he is not as rich by $25,000 as he would have been if you had let him alone.

Rapidly as the railways proceed, they can not keep up with the settlers who come in ever-increasing numbers from the Old World, eastern Canada, and the United States. The most interesting feature of this population movement is the American contribution. Eight years ago some 46 Americans moved from the United States to Canada. These were the scouts of an army that now crosses the boundary in a force of approximately 50,000 a year. In the fiscal year of 1902–3 the invading Americans numbered 49,000, officially counted; for the fiscal year just past they numbered 46,000. Thousands of Americans cross into Canada without being counted. The picturesque prairie schooner still conveys land seekers in the West. Wanderers in prairie schooners have been seen at Calgary, in Alberta, 2,000 miles from their starting place in Iowa and Nebraska.

Some one has said:

Why do these Americans, the very cream of the farming population of the wealthy American West, seek homes in a foreign country? Briefly, the answer is to be found in the lure of free or cheap lands in western Canada and the inducement to turn the old farm into cash at high prices.

This man is a heretic. He don't see that is "all on account of Eliza"—the Dingley tariff. He shakes my faith because that is just exactly what made us prosperous in comparison with Europe, too. The cream of Europe came here, disposing of old lands if they had them, and if they had not, getting rid of old low wages and coming here to buy cheaper lands that were better, or if they were going to work on the place, to give equally as good work with higher pay; and as they began to give equally as good work with higher pay they soon got to giving better work with higher pay, because higher pay puts more soul in a man, more heart in him, and makes him work better. He does not work like a galley slave, looking forward merely to that day's return, but he works with the hope that some day he can rise above that and work for still more money in a still higher situation.

Another thing has made you rich. Go to any country in the world and let it have a large surplus population that leaves it every year, and what is the character of the men who leave? They are the brave, adventurous, enterprising, courageous, sometimes reckless men. We Americans are no better morally, we are no wiser mentally, we are no stronger physically than the average German or Frenchman or Hungarian, except in so far as we live in a higher situation and are better fed. But there is one thing we are. We are as a rule more enterprising, we are more initiative, we are braver, we are more ready to throw the whole thing upon the die. Why? Because the man who left Europe and begot his children here, from whose loins we came in the course of time, was that sort of a man, and like breeds like. The timorous of his class remained behind and bred their kind there. An immense free-trade area, new and fertile lands, the bravest and most adventurous population in the world, the most adaptive, capable of the most initiative, because it comes from forbears of that sort who left the old country because they were of that sort—of course they wrought out prosperity! And then you tell me it is all owing to taxing those of them who are pursuing naturally profitable vocations in order to keep or make prosperous those of them who choose to pursue avocations that would not be prosperous at all unless the Government kept them up. That is your rule. Now, let us go on a bit. I want to get one figure here, if I can find it. Ah!

All this rapid material advance in Canada raises the question, What will the future bring?

Listen to this:

Ten years ago the maximum wheat crop of western Canada was 20,000,000 bushels. In 1902 it was 67,000,000 bushels. The next bumper crop will take the total yield of wheat to 100,000,000 bushels. It takes 117 miles of cars to handle the grain grown on the Canadian Pacific alone.

Read the following to show how rich our Dingley tariff made each individual farmer in Canada in 1904. It must have been that, because we hear of nothing else as explaining what made our farmers' crops:

This year's agricultural round-up means nearly $90,000,000 for about 60,000 actual farmers.

Truly, I believe the farther off the Dingley tariff is and the less force of law it has, the more it "benefits farmers."

There is an increase in ten years of wheat production in Canada—this is my calculation; I am not reading from the book now—of 333 per cent. In spite of the glowing tribute paid our farmers by the Secretary of Agriculture some time ago, have we in ten years increased our wheat production 333 per cent? No; and the reason is because the Dingley tariff bill applies more intensely in Canada than it does in the United States. It applies there, I suppose, by common agreement. [Laughter.]

Ten years ago the acreage devoted to wheat in Canada was 10,000,000 acres, which is an increase of 350 per cent in acreage alone.

Now, gentlemen, I do not wish to abuse your patience. I have got here something I want to read about the Argentine Republic in an article headed "Argentine, the wonderland of South America," but I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. WEEKS. May I interrupt the gentleman, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the gentleman know the relative amount of imports and exports of the United States to Canada ten years ago?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not.

Mr. WEEKS. Does he not know that they were about equal?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think in the main that that is correct.

Mr. WEEKS. Then does not the gentleman know the relative imports and exports to-day?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I read them a moment ago. I forget the exact figures.

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the gentleman know that our exports to Canada to-day are twice what our imports are from Canada?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That we buy from Canada twice as much as we sell?

Mr. WEEKS. No; the reverse. Does the gentleman consider that that is evidence that Canada is prospering at the expense of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. Chairman, I thought that the last man that worshiped the old mercantile theory that buying things you wanted impoverished you and selling things you did not want made you rich had died. [Laughter.] Both make you rich, of course. My heavens! I stood upon my feet here—but what is the use of my standing on my feet? Adam Smith stood up and demonstrated the absurdity of this old theory to the intelligence of the universe. Everybody else has dropped it long ago. If a man were made rich by what he sold alone and made poor by what he bought, then how could you ever get anything you wanted? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi said on one of the first days of the session that he was not much of a business man. I thought he was speaking modestly of himself, but I want to say now that in what he said he spoke the truth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, would not I be a fine business man if I pursued your theory? Is not the miser a fine business man who adds nothing to production of the earth, sells whatever he has got of labor, intelligence, or product, turns it into cash, buys nothing in turn, puts it in a box, and sits down on it? Even the miser buys bread. Bread to him even is worth more than the money it costs. The business man takes his assets and invests them in something. Because you buy a thing you have not wasted the money. Why do you buy it? Because you would rather have the thing than have the money. Why would you rather have the thing than the money? Because it is more profitable to you to have the thing than it is to have the money. Why will I pay a Missourian $140 for a good cotton mule? Because the mule is worth more to me than the $140. I can make more money out of the mule than I could out of $140. This gentleman would have me to believe that the business man should sit down on his $140 rather than buy the mule that is worth more to him in raising cotton than three times the value of the mule.

There is no such thing as balance of trade in the sense that the gentleman is speaking of, except in the long run the true balance. If a man sells more than he has got, he has got to steal something to sell. If you buy more than you have got the money to pay for what you buy, you have got to steal the money, and there is a balance between what is sold and what is bought. I do not mean that there is a balance between me and the gentleman from Massachusetts in our mutual dealings, or between France and Germany. I do not mean that there is a true balance between him and me. He may buy my cotton and manufacture it into cotton cloth, and I may never buy a single thing from him. I may buy mules from the gentleman from Missouri to make my cotton, and he may never buy a single thing from me, but he must sell his cotton goods made out of my cotton to somebody, and he sells them for what he paid me for cotton plus a labor value on his time and help, interest on the plant, dividend on the business, and a fair profit.

A man no more loses by what he buys, unless he is a fool and buys foolishly, than by what he sells, and he can lose by what he sells if he is a fool and sells foolishly. Why, if that were true, what would become of the tight little island of Great Britain? She has bought in the last hundred years, I suppose, about fifty times as much as she sold in this senseless "balance-of-trade" sense, and, of course, according to the gentleman's theory, she would be the multiple of fifty on the other side of insolvency. And what in the world would become of Holland, where the people are the most prosperous, where wealth is more equally distributed than any country in the world, where the people are well educated, shrewd, smart, and happy?

Holland has not seen a day for two hundred years when she did not "buy more than she sold" in this senseless "balance of trade" sense, yet in any true sense she has not bought more than she has sold. When I buy a mule from the gentleman from Missouri at $140 which he bought from a farmer when it was a colt for a hundred and ten and which he maintained for $15, making a hundred and twenty-five dollars, he has made $15 out of me, and a simpleton might imagine I had lost the $15, yet that mule may be worth to me in its productive capacity in the cotton field so much more than a hundred and forty dollars that if I could not get it for less than $200 I would pay that and still make money; so I have made money by buying the mule, he has made money by selling the mule, I have made money by selling my cotton, and you have made money by buying my cotton, and people who want to wear the goods have made money by buying the cotton goods. I thought that miserable old mercantile theory of the "balance of trade" was too dead even to smell bad in public. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I started to read to you about the Argentine Republic, and, Mr. Chairman, I am going to do it, but I have been lately by no means well——

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask permission to insert in the RECORD so much of this article in the Review of Reviews for July, 1905, entitled "Argentina, the Wonderland of South America," by John Barrett, formerly American minister to Argentina and Panama and now minister to Colombia, and a great Republican, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter to which he refers. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

The Argentine Republic, as it is commonly called, is to-day one of the most prosperous and progressive countries. Its foreign commerce for 1904 reached the immense total of $451,463,000 in gold. This was greater than that of any other Latin nation, not excepting Mexico and Brazil. It exceeded the foreign trade of Japan, of whose marvelous progress we now hear so much, and it went far beyond that of China, concerning which there is general discussion. In other words, Argentina, with only 5,000,000 people, showed a buying and selling capacity in excess of Japan with 40,000,000 people and China with 400,000,000! My comparison is no reflection on these latter countries, and I have always been an earnest advocate of the importance of our commercial and political interests in the Far East, but these should not overshadow or hide what we have at stake in South America.

That Argentina is moving ahead with proverbial leaps and bounds is proved by the fact that her foreign commerce, the best thermometer of a country's prosperity, increased $90,000,000 in 1904 over the total for 1903, which was $360,000,000. Estimating her population, as before stated, at 5,000,000, she has in the present total of $451,463,000 the remarkable average of nearly $90 per head, or a far greater average than the United States or any of the principal European countries.

Argentina boasts of splendid railway facilities. It has now nearly 20,000 miles of trunk lines. Numerous new roads, branch routes, and feeders are being constructed or planned.

* * * * * * *

The transcontinental trains that convey travelers across the broad pampas and climb the Andes to connect with the road on the Chilean side are solid and vestibuled, with up-to-date dining cars. The tourist or business man can now go from Buenos Ayres, on the Atlantic, to Santiago in Chile and Valparaiso, on the Pacific in seventy-two hours.

* * * * * * *

In conclusion, I wish to epitomize some of the foregoing facts to be remembered by the passing reader: Argentina is as large as half of the United States proper, and covers 1,200,000 square miles; it has a growing population of only 5,000,000, but an annual foreign trade of $450,000,000, or $90 per head.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This immense development in Argentina is, of course, due to the Dingley tariff. Argentina had a worse panic in 1893 than we had. This was, of course, due to the anticipation of the passage of the Wilson-Gorman bill by the Congress of the United States. I had some figures about Mexico, its progress under Diaz, still more remarkable, but I have lost them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without taking up the time further with Argentina, something was said about what a Democratic tariff is. The Democratic faith upon the tariff question can be expressed in a few words. First, a tariff is a tax. That is no longer disputed by anybody. There used to be some Republicans, who, at campaign time, used to say it is a tax, but it is a tax on the foreigner. It is not disputed now that the tariff is a tax. Secondly, it is a tax upon the consumer of the goods. Well, wherever a tariff fails to enable the producer of the article taxed to get a higher price and thereby to make the consumer pay more for the thing upon which the tariff tax has been imposed, then the tariff has simply, for some other reason, failed of its purpose. The natural result of the tariff is that it raises prices and thereby taxes the consumer.

The third Democratic idea that follows that up is this: All taxes ought to be, as nearly as possible, equal in proportion to the burden-bearing capacity of the taxpayer. In other words, there is no reason why the consumer of tea should not pay a tax while the consumer of coffee does pay a tax, or vice versa. There is no reason why the mill that consumes cotton should not pay a tax while the mill which consumes wool does, or vice versa. There is no reason why the man who wears shoes should pay a tax while the man who wears a cravat or a hat does not. The tariff is a tax upon the consumer; ought to be as nearly equal as possible, with the conditions that it is adapted to the burden-bearing capacity of the taxpayer—his ability to pay. Now, what grows out of that? The genuine ideal Democratic tariff, if one could be constructed upon a tabula rasa—unfortunately we have not a tabula rasa, and a wise man will be controlled always in urging any ideal result to a certain extent by confronting conditions—but the Democratic ideal tariff with a tabula rasa to write it on would be to divide all sorts of imports into about three classes.

First, necessities, and by necessities I mean the necessaries of life and the necessaries of industry. The necessaries of industry are raw materials of various sorts; the necessaries of life are food and clothing of the plainer and cheaper kind. Other necessities, like agricultural implements for the farmer, books for schools, the tools of the commoner, and indispensable sorts for the blacksmith and carpenter, will suggest themselves.

Such a bill would levy upon the necessaries, everything in that class, a very low tax, so that the poor man who used necessaries, or industries that had to have them, would pay a slight tax in order to get them. This tax ought to be uniform or nearly so for all articles in that class, and as low as possible. That tax might be 5 per cent, 10 per cent, or 15 per cent ad valorem, but not necessarily prescribed by ad valorem expression in form of language. And some of the prime necessaries of life such a bill would put upon the free list, but not many. And, fellow-Democrats, remember that the Walker tariff, which came nearer than any other tariff we have ever had to being an ideal Democratic measure, and under which this country throve immensely, progressing by leaps and bounds, so much so that Mr. Blaine, as the gentleman from Missouri quoted him as saying, said that in 1857, when the Whigs came into power, there was no desire on anybody's part to disturb the existing tariff tax; remember that that tariff, if I remember right, did not put but one thing on the free list, and that was salt, so far in that day did the Democratic idea go that consumers ought to pay their share, but in proportion to ability to pay, in carrying on the Government.

Then there would be another class, composed of luxuries—diamonds, fine wines, high velvets, distilled liquors, anything that is a luxury, anything that is not necessary to the life, or industry, or comfort of humanity, purely a luxury, consumed by rich people, or else by thriftless people, or else by reckless people. How would you tax them? Tax them up to the smuggling point. Make them bear all the tax the traffic can bear, because the man who consumes them is able to pay the tax. Rockefeller does not pay much more tariff tax under the present system than one of the darkies on one of my places. The poor fellow is making a tolerably good living now, but God knows that from 1890 to 1891, and up along there, he did not make much of a living.

And then, in between these two classes, one of necessaries and one of luxuries, would come the intermediate articles, which you might call "comforts." Make them pay a reasonable tax. How are you going to determine how much tax you make all of them pay after you have got them classified? Classify them as high tax, reasonable tax, low tax. But how are you going to determine how much money you want? Find out how much money you need—revenue to carry on your Government honestly, economically, and effectively, a government improving the water courses, a government giving public buildings, a government doing everything else that a strong, effective government ought to do, a government giving justice to people seeking justice, a government giving abundant governmental protection to life and limb and property, and giving it in an abundantly effective way—and then, when you find out how much you need, add a little margin to it for fear of unexpected contingencies. A little bit of a surplus is a good thing to have. Thus you would not regulate your tariff system by the desire of Tom to put money into his pockets, by the desire of Dick to put money into his pockets, by the desire of Harry to be hothoused at somebody else's expense. You would levy your taxes, not according to the necessities of the fellows who are knocking at committee doors to be hothoused into unnatural prosperity or to be hothoused into a greater prosperity than they would naturally enjoy, but according to the necessities of the Government; not according to the demand of graft, but in accordance with the demands of government.

Then what have you done? I will tell you what you will have done. You will have settled the tariff question. You will never settle it in any other way. Nothing is ever settled until it is settled right. You will never settle the tariff question, you will never have a stable system of tariff taxation, until you divorce private business from public business—the question of private demands from that of public needs—until you divorce graft from the governmental system which you administer, until you have rooted out of the mind of every American citizen the idea that the Government was made to support him, and supplant that with the idea that it is his duty to support the Government—that it costs everybody something to do it, and that therefore he had better watch it.

I said that any other sort of tariff is the mother of graft. I mean by that, of course, a protective tariff—protectionism—that is, a tariff levied for the purpose of enabling one man, by charging a higher price, to grow rich at the expense of other men. Now, answer me this, some of you——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Such as the tariff on tin plate, I suppose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the tariff on tin plate cost the American people plenty of money until they discovered new processes of making tin plate in this wonderfully inventive country of ours, and then it went down below what it ever was before the tariff was levied. Does the gentleman contend that the tariff made it go down?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I contend that the increase in the volume of production brought it about.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me fasten that right there. What increased the volume of production, the tariff or cheapened processes? Under the operation of the tariff tin plate did go down in price, below the price at which tin plate was selling before the tariff was enacted. That is an absolute truth. But it has not gone down below the price to which it subsequently went and now stands in Great Britain. And it is now costing the American people more than they could buy it for if they were allowed to buy it in the markets of the world. And not only is the great reduction in the price owing to the discovery of new inventions for treating the stuff, but it is still further due to the fact that they substituted an inferior tin in the American market for the "old style tin we used to buy."

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does the gentleman believe the price of tin, in Great Britain, for instance, went down because they were deprived of this market in a measure?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose it did. Why should it have gone down more than ours? It is the world produce that makes world price. Laws may locally raise it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Because they had no market for their tin, and we had a protected market for ours. That is the idea.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They had the world and we had the northern part of one continent, and that fenced off from competition. They had as good a market as we did.

Now, if it be true that tariff upon tin had the effect of driving the price of tin down below what it otherwise would have reached—mark that, now—not below what it was, but below what it otherwise would have reached, then one of two results follow, either that particular tariff, owing to some other reason, failed of its purpose, or else all of your arguments for protection fall to the ground, because the effect of that particular tariff was not to raise the price to the American producer, and, therefore not to bolster him up, crutch him up, or prop him up. If not, then he was not "protected," that is, did not get his share of the discriminating advantages of the system. Some other factor must account for the result. But as a matter of fact he did get his share—is getting it even now. Moreover he got it out of my pocket and yours whenever we put a tin roof on a house.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Now, I do not want to interfere with the gentleman. We claim that the purpose of the tariff, first, was to have tin plate made in America and to reduce the price, both of which have been achieved.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The purpose of the tariff was to enable the producer of tin plate in America, under the shelter of the protection of the tariff, to compete with the producer of tin plate in Wales or in Germany. In order to do that it had to raise the price of the tin plate to the American consumer. In order to raise the price of tin plate to the American consumer the American consumer had to pay more of his money, honestly earned, I hope, in order only to give more for the tin plate.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Only for a little while.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Only for a time? Even till now. Now, let us see about that. Of course, as humanity continues to progress, as industry develops, the amount of manual-labor cost in any given article becomes less and less, and the proportion of machine cost in it becomes more and more, and as cheaper processes come in vogue new inventions are applied to the protected article, and the article itself goes down in price. That is true of every manufactured article that does not depend upon disappearing raw material to such an extent that the cost of the raw material is increased beyond the decrease in the cost of producing the finished article. Of course, then, almost any manufactured article becomes gradually cheaper, even in a fenced-off market. But the fencing off did not make it cheaper.

Now, then, I will just say this: I am willing to take tin plate or any other thing. There is no way of protecting an American producer so as to enable him to compete with a cheaper producer somewhere else except by imposing a tax which enables him to charge and to get in the American market a higher price than the cheaper producer elsewhere can get after he has paid the duty and the freight. If the tariff does not accomplish that result, if instead of raising the price it reduces the price, then the tariff has failed of its purpose or else the price of the product has fallen, not because of the tariff, but because of some other reason. There is no answer to it, and there can be none. It is true that you can "hothouse" an unnecessary number of producers into a given industry, and you may get so many of them in there that they may be disposed to cut one another's throats, but we have passed that period now. We used to talk about the tariff working that way sometimes, but we have got to the point whereby the gigantic organizations or trusts—for the tariff is the mother of trusts as well as graft—they have been enabled to keep up the price in the home market, and whenever they do sell cheaper than they sell here they sell the foreigner, he having the benefit of the reduced price, the benefit of the temporary overplus of production—he, not we.

So that you are doing about what the beet-sugar bounty people did in Austria-Hungary and France—taxing all the people in order to allow some of your people to sell through the trusts cheaper to Great Britain than to you.

Now, then, let me go ahead with the Democratic tariff. The tax ought to be nearly equal, adapted to the ability of the taxpayer to pay, and therefore it ought to be lower on the necessaries than on the comforts, less on the comforts than the luxuries, and the total amount of tax to be levied ought to be determined by the necessities of the Government. Every tariff tax does carry with it some protection. There is no doubt about that. That is what I mean, and yet the power of taxation ought not to be exercised for any other purpose except a public purpose. You have got no right to levy a tax upon me for a private purpose. You have got no right to levy a tax upon me in order to keep my friend from New York [Mr. RYAN] from "going out of business." If you want me to help him from going out of business, come to me and appeal frankly to my charity to help him, and to do so out of my own money, but do not bring the strong arm of the Government upon me and say that I shall help him under the pretense that what he gets out of me enriches me.

Now, one more thing and I am done. I was sorry to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] talk about "the free-trade lesson" of the panic of 1893.

Now, my friends, are you not yourselves getting a little tired of this talk about there never being a panic except under a Democratic tariff, while history blazons in your eyes a panic in 1873, under a Republican tariff, a panic in 1819, under a very high protective tariff? Are you not getting tired of men's memories not running back far enough to know that the panic of 1893 began, on the farm at least, in 1890? You gentlemen from Kansas know that you were burning corn for fuel in 1891, weren't you? The country kept getting worse until the panic came to its acute stage, and the head of the boil broke in 1893. Is not the gentleman from Ohio aware of the fact that the panic of 1893 happened while the McKinley bill was in operation, and is he not aware of the fact that the panic was over its acute stage and business was on a rock-bottom basis for a start upward again before the Wilson-Gorman bill was enacted? Does he not know that the Wilson-Gorman bill was not enacted until 1894? And is he not aware of the fact that over there on that side of the Chamber at that time, whatever they tell us now, they said then that the panic was due to the fact that we would not hurry up and repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act—was due to a lack of confidence in our money?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is what Cleveland said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and that is what Tom Reed said, and that is what nearly everybody said over there. And, finally, is not the gentleman aware that the Wilson-Gorman bill was not a free-trade measure at all?

Mr. GROSVENOR. To which "gentleman from Ohio" does the gentleman from Mississippi refer as having spoken about the panic of 1893?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, I started to say the elder gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is myself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I referred to General KEIFER, the younger gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. When did I speak of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In your speech here upon the floor. The gentleman said that here at some prior time, in a twelve-minute speech, he had "predicted" to the American people that the way to get rid of free trade was to let the American people try it.

Mr. KEIFER. I did say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And you added, if I am not mistaken—if I am, of course, the gentleman will correct me—that the panic came in 1893, and the people were seen stalking the streets, hungry, and all that. I can not repeat the gentleman's eloquent words in which he described their sufferings. And the gentleman said that since then the American people were not going to risk free trade any more. That is the way I understood him.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has just simply fallen into an imaginary notion about my speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman's speech has not been printed yet. Will he send me the stenographic notes of the official report?

Mr. KEIFER. I did not speak of a panic coming in 1893 by reason of the Wilson-Gorman bill that was passed August 27, 1894.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I apologize to the gentleman most deeply and most humbly. I so understood him. I have heard twenty gentlemen on that side say so, and I thought the gentleman was saying the same thing. The gentleman did say that he predicted that the only way to get away from free trade was to let them try it, and that they had tried it, and that in 1893 the country saw the result of it.

Mr. KEIFER. That I said, and I stand by it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How did they try free trade in 1893, when the McKinley bill was in existence in 1893, and until August 27, 1894? Was it free trade?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I know what you are going to say. You have told me that three times, and there is not a bit more sense in it now than there was the first time you told it. You said it was an anticipation of a Democratic tariff.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the gentleman might let me make my own statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman says that what brought about the panic of 1893 was the anticipation of Democratic victory. Was it the anticipation of Democratic victory that brought about the panic of 1873? What brought about the panic of 1819? Was it the anticipation of Democratic victory? What brought about the panic in Australia and in Austria and in Great Britain in 1893? Was it the anticipation of a Democratic victory? What brought about the panic in Canada in 1893? Canada had as a bad a panic as we had that year. Was it the anticipation of Democratic victory in Canada? What has made Canada since then increase 333 per cent in wheat production? What has made her increase 250 per cent to 350 per cent in her wheat area, gathering herself up from the débris of 1893, when she suffered as we did, and making that gain in the next succeeding ten years, far surpassing in proportion the gain that we made in the same time? Was it the displacement of the Democratic party and the enactment of the Dingley bill in Canada?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Mississippi is hardly fair. He occasionally interrupts me, and I have always yielded to him. Now I ask him the privilege of stating what I did say, and the gentleman goes on and pours out a thunderstorm of words about Canada, and this is the third time he has gone through that Canada business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is the third time I have had to answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, if the gentleman will let me go on, I will put it in a sentence. There was the Democratic platform of 1892, upon which Mr. Cleveland was elected, in pursuance of which he wrote the celebrated free-trade letter declaring that all forms of protection were robbery; a Democratic party had got control of the House; a Democratic Senate had come into power, and the consequence of it was that a stampede took place in this country that was followed up and emphasized by the passage of the Wilson bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I knew what the gentleman from Ohio was going to say, and I answered by saying that exactly the same cause led to the panic in Canada and in Australia and all over the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman from Ohio has just said that the depression came from the anticipation of the Democrats coming into power. Will the gentleman explain why Kansas corn was burned in 1890 and 1891, before that Democratic declaration that all kind of tariff was robbery? I would like to hear him explain that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] assured the American people until long after the votes were counted that Cleveland was not going to be elected and was not elected, and is it not a fact that the revenues of the Government began to diminish months and months before the election of Cleveland? Is it not also a fact that Mr. Foster issued an order for the bonds ten days before the close of the Harrison Administration?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; all that is true. Now, Mr. Chairman, I might have put the question to the genial gentleman from Ohio as to whether he had not assured the American people for some time before and after the election of Cleveland that he would not be elected and was not elected, but I was afraid the gentleman from Ohio might respond by saying that the American people would not believe him, and that would have put us both in a bad attitude. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am both tired and sick, and I ask permission of the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the distinguished leader on the other side of this Chamber, has stated the old Democratic doctrine that has been heard over the United States for the last sixty or eighty years, that the tariff is a tax, and he says that nobody denies it. Of course nobody denies it, because there is hardly anybody in the United States to-day that believes it, except a certain portion of the Democratic leaders and some free-trade professors in the universities. It is pretty late in the day to enter into a general discussion of the tariff question. It is almost a pathetic thing to see a gentleman standing up here on this floor and spending from one to two hours in rehashing the old Democratic doctrine of free-trade Democracy and in reading lessons to the Republican party of the United States, and calling attention to the fact that that party is a decadent party. It did pretty well in the last campaign. The same doctrines which the gentlemen have enunciated here were talked about in the last Presidential campaign, have been declared on every Democratic stump, talked of in all the newspapers, and argued in every legislative chamber, and the American people, by a majority more overwhelming than that which it gave to any Republican candidate, elected Theodore Roosevelt, and elected him because he was a protectionist. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Mississippi says that the Republican part of this Chamber will not do anything with the tariff, but will let it alone; that there is no sentiment among the party leaders for revision, but that we will "stand pat" because we are bound and riveted together. I want to suggest to him that before I get through he will find that some of us are not bound and riveted, and I want to suggest further to the gentleman from Mississippi that they had better get in a little work to bind and rivet together the scattered remnants of the Democracy, so that they can make a respectable appearance before the people of the United States. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

There is some division on this side of the Chamber about the tariff question. I come from the Mississippi Valley. I represent a State which is both agricultural and manufacturing, and I represent a part of the Republican party of Wisconsin, and I believe that that party in that State believes that it is the duty of the Republican leaders of this House and of the Republican Administration to revise the tariff system and adjust it to the conditions which exist to-day. Some of us on this side of the Chamber find ourselves in rather a peculiar position, not only upon this question, but upon other questions.

I was born of Whig parentage; all my life has been spent in the Republican party. No man can charge me with disloyalty to the principles of that organization which is represented in this majority; I am not a protectionist because I am a Republican, but I am a Republican because I am a protectionist. I want to say, further, to the gentleman from Mississippi that although we have divided judgment here you have any number of divided judgments upon your side of the Chamber, and there is more than one man sitting in his seat as a Democratic Representative who does not believe any more in the free-trade doctrine that he has enunciated than gentlemen on this side of the Chamber. It is only a few months ago that I had occasion to go down to the State of Virginia, to the beautiful city of Richmond, and address a large gathering of farmers from every State in the Union. I came in personal contact with many ex-Confederate officers, dyed-in-the-wool Democrats, good fellows, as we know them to be, and three out of four told me they were glad that Theodore Roosevelt was elected, because the election of a Republican President meant the continuation of the protective-tariff policy and greater prosperity, not only for the North, but prosperity for the South.

I do not want to make a stump speech upon the prosperous conditions which exist in the United States to-day in reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Mississippi. He talks about the theory of free trade and he talks about right and wrong, but does he forget that not only the Government of the United States is dominated by men and by a public sentiment which approves of a protective tariff policy, but that Russia, Germany, France, and every civilized nation on earth, except England, have protective tariffs, and even the colonies of Great Britain protect themselves against the mother country? Does the gentleman imagine that he alone has the moral sense, that he alone knows the distinction between right and wrong, and that nearly all the great governments of the earth are destitute of both morality and sound political judgment? Not only that, but there is a rising tide of protection—of protection sentiment everywhere—and increased duties are being levied for the protection of the business life and industries of every nation upon the earth, except the one that I have named. It is a little singular, but the people who are in favor of free trade are the gentlemen who think in their closets and write books on political economy and the leaders of the Democratic party, but the men who do business and raise revenues and run the governments and develop the industries of great nations all over the globe, all of them believe in the protective tariff policy that is defined and defended by the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, then, gentlemen, it has been my fortune all my life to be connected, more or less, with agricultural interests. If there is any class of men to whom the siren song of the free trader can go with more effect than any other it is to the farmer. He receives very little direct protection, but there is no class of men in the United States of large numbers and extent that received more benefit from this protective-tariff system than the American farmer. He has appreciated it, he has stood by the party, and favored that system. Why is he interested in it? Because protection diversifies industries, builds factories, opens up avenues for the exercise of human talent, human ingenuity, and human genius, because it tends to take a man from the farm and put him in a factory; it tends to take him from the farm and make him a consumer of the things the farmer produces. Away back in 1860 in the State of Wisconsin, where I lived, 80 men out of 100 were engaged upon the farms. Twenty men out of 100 in that State were buying the products of the farmer. To-day, under the growth of our manufacturing interests in that State, 49 men are producing upon the farm within the limits of that State and 51 men are buying the things that the farmer produces. Oh, we could tell you about tin plate and we could tell you about steel and we could tell you about cotton goods and woolen goods, shoes, and everything which enters into the needs of human life, cheapened to the consumer by the effect of the Republican protective tariff. But I do not want to take the time to do it. It is not necessary.

The American people have settled that question practically and properly, not only for now but for years to come, and the question which comes home to us in the consideration of this bill, we who believe thoroughly in this protective-policy principle, is what we will do in reference to a measure which proposes to open up the American markets to the unrestricted competition of the products of the Philippines. That is the question. It is not always pleasant to be considered an insurgent. Some of you know how it is; you know what sort of discipline you get; you know what you have to meet; you know the many things that are brought to bear; but I say that the men who oppose this bill are not insurgents, and I do say that we have the remarkable spectacle of the Republican leaders of this Chamber and the Administration going into the insurgents' camp themselves and leaving us without leaders.

The Republic will see the friends of this bill joining with the free-trade Democracy to diminish the protection which is to-day received by the men upon the farms of this country. [Applause upon the Republican side.] I want to say to you, gentlemen, that not for one solitary moment would I criticise the purity of the motives of the President of the United States or of the gentlemen who are leaders upon this floor.

I want to say to you that there are some Republicans favoring this Philippine tariff bill who are hurting their political interests in their districts, and I bow to them in respect because they are following their judgment, their conscience, and their convictions. But you must also understand that the rest of us do the same thing. If there were not one solitary pound of tobacco produced in my district or my State, if there were not one solitary pound of sugar produced in my district or my State, I would be opposed to the Philippine tariff law. Why? The question of plain duty has been raised here. We hear it every day, in every discussion, in nearly every speech. Do you not think it is getting to be a little bit overworked? What is our plain duty? Have not we done fairly well by the people of the Philippine Islands? What have we done? By the way, we have obtained those islands, and we got them properly. There is not time to discuss that fairly. But there was nothing else under heaven that the United States could do except to hold them and care for those people as we have done. What did we do in the interest of humanity? We declared war against a nation with which we were at peace. We went into that war and we saddled ourselves with expenses amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, issued the bonds of the Government, and are paying interest upon those bonds to-day and will for many years to come. We unsettled, to some extent, the business of this country. We raised an army, we sacrificed the lives of thousands of men, and there was mourning in many homes, both North and South.

We have given to those islands a stable government at the cost of money and the cost of men. We have established thousands of schools in which there are half a million of children. We are building railroads over those islands. We have established courts of justice there where justice can be had. And it seems to me we have done as our plain duty required us to do, to make the Filipino people good citizens, to give them liberty, to give them instruction, and to fit them for self-government. Why, the gentlemen have talked about the capacity of the island for sugar and tobacco production. They tell us what the census figures are, and every man in this Chamber who has read the testimony and the literature upon that subject knows that no live man can tell the capacity of the Philippine Islands for the production of either sugar or tobacco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think that the gentleman is better versed on tobacco than I am. My district is a tobacco district; however, I never raised any. Can the gentleman tell me what effect the production of Porto Rican tobacco has had on his tobacco market?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. No, sir; I can not tell you.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It has had such little effect upon our people that they do not know it has been introduced. I am glad that the gentleman has stated that his people are all happy and prosperous.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I do not say that they are all prosperous, but——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You speak of the Filipinos as "our children." Does not the gentleman think that when his people are basking in the sunshine of so much glorious prosperity he should let those little stepchildren at least send a few of their things over here to sell to us when it will not hurt us?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. That is precisely what I think—"when it will not hurt us." The Philippine Islands contain seven and one-half millions of people and Japan, which has less fertile territory than the Philippines, contains 48,000,000 of people; and when these gentlemen say to us that because their ways are crude, because those people are lazy and shiftless and thriftless, there is no danger in their competition to American industry, they are simply disregarding the law which prevails when an enlightened nation gets hold of a fertile country and establishes law there and makes property safe and life and investment safe; and I want to say to the gentleman that beyond any question—and this is a question of judgment—so far as my judgment goes there is richness enough of soil and area enough of soil in the Philippine Islands when capital becomes assured of its safety to increase the sugar products of those islands and the tobacco products of those islands until they shall seriously compete with the sugar and tobacco interests of the United States.

Now, if the gentleman will wait a minute before he asks another question. I was interested in the speech of the gentleman from Ohio. I was rather amused by his statement that the cigars made in the Philippine Archipelago are not fit to smoke, and that they would never come into the American market and obtain any standing here. Then, on top of that the gentleman said he never smoked a cigar himself and did not know anything about it. [Laughter.] That struck me as being about as valuable as that literature contributed to the Lady's Journal by old maids who have been giving instructions to mothers how to take care of their children. Now, I have smoked these cigars—five or six brands of them—and I do not think my physical appearance is caused by smoking them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think you will find a great many things will go up in smoke before you get through with this.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Some of them are not very good, some of them are very poor, and one brand is exceedingly good, and every solitary brand that my friend, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, brought back from the Philippines and was kind enough to give to me would find a place in the market of every State in the Union, because, although they are not very good, they will be cheap.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Any number of suggestions from the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish here in the interest of truth to say that the one I tried on the gentleman from Wisconsin is the only one that worked well. I tried it on eight or ten other gentlemen and none of them said it was a good smoke, and said, "Have you not got something else besides this?" [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I can say in answer to that, Mr. Chairman, that the reason for it is this: that I am a simple ordinary farmer, accustomed to smoke ordinary cigars, and the friends of my friend were mostly millionaires.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, why have you not kept on smoking those Porto Rican cigars?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I have not smoked any Porto Rican cigars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why is not the gentleman disposed to keep on smoking the Philippine cigars?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I will smoke them just as long as Mr. COOPER gives them to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Ah, now; it is because he gives you something, that is the only advantage. There may be some force in that. Now, with the average cost and the insurance, etc., on these cigars, which can be brought here in twenty-six days from the Philippine Islands, are you disposed to think that those things will not make the price of these cigars rather higher than cigars can be bought for here?

Just a few minutes now. I am talking seriously of the matter, as I am a tobacco man myself. I think the Constitution follows the flag, and I am not going to follow the Supreme Court to the contrary. Now, while these cigars can come in twenty-one days from the Philippine Islands, paying the insurance on them and the expense otherwise—I do not know what the expense would be—and then putting 25 per cent tariff on top of that and hauling them over into the Mississippi Valley in which we both live, are you not disposed to believe that that will be very expensive traveling for that cigar to the man who imports it and that it will prove an embargo on its sale?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Oh, no. I will say to the gentleman I have only a few minutes and I can not answer that question in a moment.

Now, another thing. When you talk about the capacity of the Philippines for the production of tobacco you are treading on ground that you can not know very much about. Away back forty years ago in Wisconsin we began raising tobacco around the little village of Edgerton. They raised it for many years. It was generally claimed that it was the only place in the State of Wisconsin where it was possible to raise that kind of tobacco. Time passed along and they began the study of soils; they began to understand the matter. The industry began to spread.

It went over the county of Dane and into the counties of Rock and Richland and away up in the county of Vernon, and went all over one-half of the State of Wisconsin, because of the knowledge that came to them as time passed and scientific investigation came to their aid. I want to say to the gentlemen of that committee and to the gentlemen of this House that just as certainly as time passes and we make life and property safe in those islands you will find that there will come a gradual development of their tobacco interest, a development of their sugar interests, and American interest in those two things will be seriously interfered with. There is no nation on the globe but what protects its own sugar interests against the cheap sugar of tropical countries. It may be insisted here, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania came closer to the heart of this controversy perhaps than anyone on the other side of this question, that we are bound to do this thing because the Administration is committed to it, because the leaders of this House are committed to it.

But I want to say to you, gentlemen, that no man need fear to vote upon this question or any other which comes up in this House in accordance with his own judgment and his own conscience simply because of the position of the Administration. The distinguished gentleman who is now President of this Republic has won his way into the hearts and the affections of the American people because he has insisted that his obligations and the obligations of all men should be not simply to party, but to country, and that always they should remember the obligations of individual conscience and individual judgment. [Applause.] And I want to say to the Members of this House on the Republican side that if they want to be loyal to the preachings and the teachings of Theodore Roosevelt they will not vote for this bill simply because the Administration is for it. They will not vote for it simply because the organization of this House is for it, but they will vote in accordance with their own consciences and their own judgment, because when they do that they are men. They will remember that their responsibility is not simply to the administration of the House or to the Administration of the country, but to the people who sent them here.

I want to say one other thing, that day by day the lines are drawing closer, and day by day the membership of both parties are coming closer to a common platform. I want to say further that the Administration in the White House can not and will not permit its friends in this House to whip the party lash about our heels. It can not afford to do so when a Cabinet minister goes into a disputed State in a hot campaign and makes a speech which has the effect of turning down the Republican candidate for governor and electing the Democratic candidate.

Mr. JAMES. What Republican Cabinet officer made that speech?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. The gentleman can read the papers, and he knows perfectly well. I am not criticising the President, and I want to commend his independence, and I want to commend the rising spirit of independence that has come up in the Democratic party in the city of New York and in many Southern States. Not only in the cloakrooms and on the streets and in the hotels, but elsewhere, I hear from Republicans and from Democrats this doctrine that we should stand together upon business questions; that we who believe we are right regarding the business interests of this country should not permit party labels to be put upon simple business questions.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. The gentleman is at liberty to ask me any question which is pertinent to this subject.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that the Cabinet officer to whom the gentleman referred was William H. Taft, and that he was speaking against ring rule and against Cox in Cincinnati?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Do you say that caused the defeat of the Republican ticket in Ohio?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. It is so stated by the press of that State and by Democratic gentlemen on the floor of this House.

Mr. JAMES. Then the Republican party stood for ring rule there?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. No, sir.

Mr. JAMES. How did it defeat you there, then?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I say it had that effect there—that the Republican President permitted a Cabinet officer to go into a State where a hot campaign was raging, and, to be more explicit than in my former statement, he did denounce ring rule—denounced the rule of men who were supporting the Republican candidate, and the effect of that unquestionably was to elect the Democratic candidate in that State.

I want to say to the leaders of this House and to the rank and file that there is a rising spirit of independence all over the land. There never was a time since I cast my first vote when the two political parties were standing so close together as they are now. The bitter questions raised by the war are being forgotten. The North and South are coming together in a closer union. You men of the South are beginning to find out that we of the North are pretty good fellows, and we are beginning to find out that you of the South are pretty good fellows. [Applause.] When we come into the discussion of a question of this kind we should disregard party lines and sectional lines and lines of every kind and stand up here as American citizens, exercising the faith that is in us and voting in accordance with that faith. For one I believe that the men who represent the $40,000,000 invested in sugar factories, the men who have the duty of representing here the owners of the hundreds of millions of dollars invested in sugar-beet farms, the men who represent the owners of the $100,000,000 invested in tobacco lands of the United States, the cigar makers and manufacturers of the United States, who manufactured last year $167,000,000 worth of cigars and cigarettes, all these great interests which have been built up under the protective tariff policy of the Republican party are right when they say that the opening up of these islands, with their wide territory and fertile soil and swarming population, will be a menace to those industries.

I believe that we are right, and I believe that our plain duty in the future and now, as it always has been, is for us on the Republican side to stand by the interests of our own people as against those of any other people on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Why, the other day when the gentleman from New York made his speech, if I could have closed my eyes I could have imagined that it was a speech delivered by the eloquent gentleman from Mississippi. We heard the same old song that we have heard in many campaigns—a tribute to American genius, a tribute to American enterprise, a tribute to the industry and the spirit and productive power of the American people. And then he says: "How are they going to compete with us; how are the ragged devils on the other side of the world going to compete with such people as these?" Why, that is Democratic doctrine that we have heard from the Democratic side of this Chamber for the last forty years and in every campaign. The trouble is that they can compete; they have competed, and if it had not been for the policy of the Republican party, maintained in spite of the position of our Democratic friends, you would not have thirteen hundred millions of dollars in gold under the currency of the nation and you would not have exported within the last nine years over seven billions and a half of agricultural products; you would not have had enormous exports of manufactures; you would not have had an annual balance of trade in our favor of $450,000,000 since the golden days of McKinley, and you would not have to-day this country rich and happy with the splendid prosperity which we enjoy. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Mr. Chairman, I would hardly venture to participate in this discussion at this late hour if it were not for the fact that I was one of those who made the journey through the Orient, touching at the Hawaiian Islands, China, Japan, and visiting the Philippine Islands, with the Congressional committee who lately made that tour. Therefore, in these remarks I will confine myself chiefly to giving evidence as to what we saw. I am unused to this kind of work; nevertheless I am capable of forming just impressions and of reasonably detailing them to those who are willing to listen.

I do not know how the people on the eastern side of the continent viewed the situation when war was declared between the United States and Spain; I do not know how you viewed the situation of the Philippine Islands; but I do know that the people of the Pacific coast looked with much apprehension across the waters and saw the supposedly powerful Spanish fleet operating on the coast of Asia. I know that it brought relief to every man and woman in California when the news was flashed over the wires that the President of the United States had ordered Admiral Dewey to the bay of Manila to destroy the Spanish fleet. With the destruction of that fleet came relief to the citizens of California, because we knew that it would no longer be possible for that fleet to prey upon American commerce or, perhaps, descend upon and ravish the coasts of our State.

One of the gentlemen on the other side alluded to the fact that it was American greed for power and glory and the conquest of arms that took the flag across the Pacific and planted it over the walls of Manila. This is not the fact. When Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet in Manila, it was instantly apparent to the writers of the world's history that the power of Spain was ended in the Philippine Islands. Spain's ability to protect the civilization then existing in the Philippine Islands was destroyed at the same time. It did not take Admiral Dewey long to understand that the cosmopolitan bands under Aguinaldo, to the number of 60,000, gathered behind the city of Manila, could not protect that city. And so it became imperatively necessary that the United States should rise to the measure of its responsibility and protect that civilization, and she rose to that necessity, and the islands are ours to-day.

With that responsibility came the further one, the duty of establishing a stable government. I do not intend to recapitulate the history of the breaking out of the insurrection, I do not intend to say very much about the sending out of the Schurman Commission, but we all know the anxiety that was felt throughout the Republic and the hopes and prayers expressed that peace should soon be brought about. We know how in time Secretary Taft was sent over to the islands with a commission from President McKinley, his duty being first to endeavor to establish peaceful relations between the leaders of the insurrectos and the American Government. When these relations were established it was then his duty to form a civil government that should supersede the military. I do not need to trace the course of the work of the Secretary and of the splendid Commission which accompanied him. Suffice it to say that to-day the Philippine Islands are thoroughly organized with a splendid system of government. They have a great territory, if I may use that word, and reasonable consideration by the American Government at this time will guarantee them a useful and a prosperous future career.

They have rebuilt, almost, the city of Manila; they have improved her harbors; they have built warehouses; they have built a breakwater to guard the shipping; they have fitted, as it were, the city of Manila so that she may in a very short time become the great maritime city of the Orient. They have gone further. They have improved the harbors of Iloilo and Cebu. In fact the only criticism that might be made of the Taft Commission and the insular government as now established is that perhaps they have proceeded a little faster than the people of the islands were able to endure.

What is the result? On our visit to the islands, as we were supposed to do, we took a trip through the various provinces for the purpose of ascertaining the wishes of the people, for the purpose of studying the industrial and economic conditions, and I submit that any observing man could soon inform himself as to the absolute necessity that the United States at this time should hold forth a hand to help those people upon their feet. [Applause.]

For more than seven years predatory insurgent bands have traveled over their plantations, labor has been driven from its employment, homes have been destroyed, all organized industry has been displaced. Usurers from China and Japan have taken advantage of the necessities of the people; money is loaned at great risk, and the money lenders of China and Japan, taking advantage of these deplorable conditions, make loans to the people of the Philippine Islands at the rate of from 1½ to 3 per cent a month. It is almost impossible for those poor people to rise to any civic dignity as a commercial section of the world without assistance from this country. The pledges of two Administrations have gone forth to them—the pledges of President McKinley and President Roosevelt—and the question before this House at this moment is, Are those pledges to be kept or not? The insular government has laid the foundation of prosperity in the Philippines. It has done the best it can do, and now all that is asked is that the United States shall do its part to bring these islands into closer relations with the mother country.

I yield to no man in this House in my devotion to the principle of protection. I personally have known what it was to lose my job because of a change of tariff, and I am devoted to the principle of protection, but I do not believe that my devotion to protection calls upon to support a measure that will perpetuate injustice to more than 7,000,000 people who to-day are trustingly living under the protection of the American flag.

Many in this House are anxious to extend American trade in the Orient. We hear a good deal on every side about oriental trade, and we hear more from the workingmen of the Pacific coast about excluding the Japanese cooly from our shores; American labor fears his competition, especially in California. Then we hear on the floor of this House the answer, that we must have the oriental trade, even if we disregard the wishes and interests of the laboring men of the Pacific coast. Why, gentlemen, in that trip through the Orient, we visited Japan as well as the Philippine Islands, and it seems to me that any reasonable person observing the preparations which Japan is making to-day for a great industrial career, must come to the conclusion that she will be as successful, commercially and industrially, as she has been in conquering the forces of Russia upon land and sea. We visited the principal cities of Japan, and found in every one of them amazing industrial activity. We found them making preparations for the manufacture of almost every commodity that is used in the oriental world. In the city of Osaka, which is called the "Pittsburg of Japan," we found buildings being erected almost upon every street corner and smoking chimneys upon every corner of those buildings. We found that the great statesmen of Japan, headed by Marquis Ito, were even then making preparations for the bringing back of the armies from Manchuria and Korea, and the training of them in industrial methods, even as they have been training them for the last fifteen years in the use of arms. I prophesy now, and it does not need the tongue of a prophet to tell you, gentlemen, that the result of Japanese development along industrial lines, within the next ten years, under the tutelage that is even now being given them, will be as startling to the world as the wonderful victories they recently won from Russia upon the bloody fields of Manchuria and Korea or the stormy waters of the Sea of Japan.

What will America meet in Japanese industrial competition? She will meet a people absolutely unscrupulous in trade, commerce, and productive methods. She will meet a nation with the lowest-priced well-trained skilled labor in the world. On our recent trip through the Orient we learned that Japanese laborers work for 20 cents a day, American money; Japanese mechanics of ordinary ability for 35 cents, while the highest skilled mechanical workmen receive no more that 1 yen per day, which is less than 50 cents in gold.

We found how they were equipping their plants. It might be a cotton industry, it might be a woolen factory, it might be a boot and shoe manufactory, but we found them installing in those plants American and European machinery. The great cost of establishing an enterprise in this country is the expense of up-to-date high-speed machinery. In the United States the manufacturer who contemplates establishing an industry must first estimate the cost of such machinery. He buys, of course, the latest improved inventions. It may take a dozen, twenty, or a hundred machines to equip that factory. The cost of a plant may be five times the actual cost of making the machinery. Why? Because every cog and wheel and crank of the machines he buys is patented under American and European patent laws, and so the buyer of machinery pays a royalty to the patentee, and the total cost of equipment is proportionally high.

But in Japan they buy American machinery for a model only. They send to this country, buy the latest-made machine, take it over there, and their skillful mechanics take it to pieces and make as many more like it as they require to equip their establishments, and by this method they furnish their industrial plants with machinery at one-fifth the outlay an identical equipment would cost in the United States. In Japan they simply pay no respect to the patent laws of America or those of European countries, and infringe upon all patents alike with absolute impunity. Thus they have a bed-rock capitalization added to their bed-rock labor cost. And, added to all this, these Japanese competitors of ours can buy their raw materials in the world's markets as cheaply as the manufacturers of the United States or Europe, and yet we dream of industrially exploiting Japan, Korea, Manchuria, or China—we dream of sending our ships to those oriental lands and secure such a great proportion of oriental trade that it shall build up the industries of the United States and make the nation great.

It is a vain dream. It will never be realized. We will never exploit, commercially or industrially, any territory under the flag of Japan or any nation under her guardianship, as China is to-day.

Read the reports which come from China. China—world-old China—slothful, prejudiced, and timid for a thousand years, at last rousing from her indolence of centuries under the tutelage of Japan, is developing, training, and disciplining an army which may astonish the world and bid defiance to all the powers of the white nations.

While on our return from the Philippine Islands we stopped at the city of Yokohama, and there I was told by one of the officers who accompanied General MacArthur through Manchuria that already Japan had on the way 30 American mills for the grinding of the grain of the fields of Manchuria. They were not 30 American mills made in the factories of the United States, but 1 American mill, used as a model, and 29 others manufactured in Japan, at one-fifth the American cost, and yet we dream we will compete with those people in securing the trade of the Orient. We desire trade with the Orient, of course we do, and we have a logical way to get the measure of oriental trade that should come to America. We have the Philippines upon our hands. God knows they are a great problem and it should be the desire of every honest American heart to aid the Government, the leaders of the Republican party, and President of the United States to work out that problem for the well-being and the glory of the American Republic.

We have a magnificent opening in the Orient now. The Philippine Islands, with their more than 7,000,000 of inhabitants, with a fertile soil, a people eager for education, ambitious to progress upward along the pathway of the world's civilization, anxious to buy, because they need the things America manufactures in such abundance—as soon as these people become more prosperous, as they surely will under the operation of a reduced tariff between the islands and the United States, they will become a great consuming market for the products of the farms and mills of the States and Territories of the East and West. I believe in protecting beet sugar, as I believe in protecting other industries. But fortunately in California we have something else besides beet-sugar factories to consider. We produce in California gold, as does the State of Colorado. California rejoices in some of the greatest forests in the world. Why, the counties of Mendocino and Humboldt alone can supply building material for half the United States for a hundred years to come, and we want to send lumber to the Philippines to be used in the construction of buildings and railways.

We raise cattle in California; we raise sheep in California, and we want to send meat products to the Philippines in refrigerator ships. California is one of the greatest wool-producing States in the Union, and we want to send our share of such woolen products as they consume to the Philippines.

California has the splendid plains of the San Joaquin Valley, where the food of a continent may be produced, and, above all, there is no section of the world equal to the valley of the Sacramento in the production of fruits, deciduous and citrus, vegetables, and farm products, and we hope to create markets for all this great variety of products in the Philippine Islands.

As we traveled through the islands we found their imports came from Europe and from all parts of the world except the United States. Poor as they were last year they nevertheless imported $30,000,000 worth of products, and yet the United States sold them less than $4,000,000 worth. We traveled over those islands from end to end, from Luzon to Jolo, and we could not find that California wines, California fruits, or California vegetables were sold anywhere. They brought their pork and their beef, as well as dairy products and flour, from Australia. They brought rice, a crop on which they were short at that time, from the French East Indies.

And so they are importing from the world. How much better policy it would be then to have this nation of ours pass such laws as would have a tendency to bring that people into closer relation with us and make them loyal to American sovereignty, contented with American occupation, and the consumers of American products. [Applause on the Republican side.] We would not then be passing class legislation. We would not then be legislating for the beet-sugar interests alone, but rather would we then be legislating on broad lines for a great producing people and a great consuming market. I have a duty to my district which I recognize. My district is interested in beet-sugar production, but we are also interested in lumber and meat and dairy products and grain and fruits and wines; and my idea of legislation is to so shape my course and cast my vote as to do the greatest good for the greatest number. Therefore I am constrained to support the measure of the Ways and Means Committee. Why? First, as a measure of justice; second, because it is for the honor of the nation to support it; because it will carry out the pledges made by two Administrations, and the fulfillment of those pledges will help lift these people up in the scale of civilization and ultimately make them the consumers of the products of this great country; finally, because I believe that in supporting this bill of the Ways and Means Committee I will be doing more for the American workingman and the American producer than if I opposed it. These are the reasons why I unqualifiedly give my support to the measure. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I should not venture to take part in this discussion if it had been confined to the bill before the committee, for I am well aware that those who have spoken and others who may speak have had opportunities to give the subject a personal scrutiny which entitles them to speak with authority. I propose to very briefly refer to another phase of the tariff which has been injected into this debate, but before doing so, as I intend to vote for this bill, I wish to put on record my reasons for favoring its adoption.

We frequently hear repeated the statement that if Admiral Dewey, having found and destroyed the Spanish fleet, as he was ordered to do, had then sailed away, the Philippine question would have been settled then and there, but such a suggestion made as an afterthought does not do justice to the situation which we had to face. In time of war it is a duty to damage the resources of the enemy as well as the enemy himself, and I believe that it would have been bad tactics to have turned our backs on a captured dependency of the enemy which was a source of revenue and which might have been used as a base in future operations before the end of the war, and we should remember that the Spanish fleet was destroyed and Manila captured months before peace was made. Moreover, there was another vital reason why this course was not practicable. Admiral Dewey had been ordered to leave Hongkong, a neutral port, within forty-eight hours, so he could not have returned there or have gone to any other neutral port without being either warned away or interned; his only resource would have been to go to Hawaii, which if our Democratic friends had prevailed would not have been available, or to return to an American port, leaving Manila and all of the foreign interests there liable to pillage and destruction. I doubt if there is a Member of this House who, if he had had the responsibility of acting at that time, whatever might have been his judgment or wishes as to the future of the islands, would have taken any other course. There was then and is now a great diversity of opinion among the people of this country as to the advisability of retaining these islands, and while I would welcome any honorable and practical suggestion to get them off our hands, I see no such way at present, and I doubt if there has been a day since that eventful May morning in 1898 when we could have turned them over to others with honor or credit to ourselves or to the advantage of the Filipinos; furthermore, such policy as we have formulated indicates that we are likely to hold the islands for years, if not perpetually; therefore, whether we like them or not, whether they are a desirable acquisition or not, I believe that we have reached a stage in the development of this question when we should cease treating them as half American and half foreign, and, being in complete control, with peace prevailing throughout the islands, I can not see why they should not be treated as have been Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico.

If they are American territory there is no more reason for continuing duties in one case than in the others; we have long since removed all trade restrictions with the others and we have given one of them representation in this House. When this House legislates for those who have no voice here and at the same time for our own benefit it should be at least just and fair. Briefly, these are my reasons for supporting this measure, and the reasons for delay in adopting final free trade with the islands seem to me sound and wise and in no way can I see that this solution of this question affects or indicates the action which this House might take on tariff revision, reciprocity, or other tariff action with foreign countries, as has been suggested. I wish it did indicate on the part of my party associates a readiness to consider other and more important tariff matters and to dispose of them with the same dispatch which has marked and will continue to mark their action in this case. The modern up-to-date Republican party has framed two tariffs, which in an exceptional way have met the business needs at the times when they were enacted; it has to-day the same ability and power and I believe incentive, and it should in my opinion act once more. The gentleman from Missouri in his desire to show that the Democratic party had had, if it does not possess now, the faculty to perfect a businesslike tariff went back sixty years for his first and only example. It is true that the Walker tariff did produce adequate revenue for the necessities of the Government, but a man would be a very careless student of history not to see that this was due quite as definitely to the Mexican war and the expansion which followed it and to the unprecedented impetus given all industries by the discovery of gold in California as to the merits of the tariff itself. But even assuming for argument's sake that this law was adequate and effective, the fact should not be lost sight of that a change in it was recommended by a Democratic President, that the change was made by a Congress in which the Senate was Democratic and although the House had a Republican Speaker, he was elected as a compromise and that in no sense did the Republican party as then made up represent the tariff policy which has been consistently followed by it since the early days of the civil war, when it first came into complete control of the Government. As a matter of record only about half of the Republicans who from the first supported the successful candidate for Speaker, General Banks, supported the tariff, and for all essential purposes it was the work of the disorganized Democracy and approved by a Democratic President—Pierce; but the gentleman from Missouri failed to call the most competent witness to pass on the merits of this revised measure, James Buchanan, who in his first annual message to Congress, in December, 1857, spoke of the conditions produced by this bill as follows:

> The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices and, up till within a brief period, our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country, in its monetary interests, is, at the present time, in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty, in all the productions of agriculture, and in all the elements of natural wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government * * * has been greatly reduced whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session are very large in amount. Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session.

A loan of $20,000,000 was made in 1857, another in 1858 of the same amount, and, in fact, a loan was required each year of Mr. Buchanan's Administration to make up the deficiency in the running expenses of the Government, the rate of interest increasing as the loans increased, until the last loan made by this Administration could not be obtained without paying 12 per cent for the money. The total appropriations these years did not exceed $75,000,000, so that a $20,000,000 loan would bear about the relation to the total expenditure that $125,000,000 would to the annual appropriations to-day.

The country has had one other example, has seen one other attempt, of the Democratic party to formulate tariff legislation, furnishing another illustration of the incapacity of a Democratic Administration to handle the tariff question intelligently, for it did exactly what its platform had repeatedly condemned in passing a high tariff bill which President Cleveland denounced as an act "tainted with perfidy and dishonor," and it was framed with so little regard for the needs of the country that it, too, failed to produce sufficient revenue, so that we once more resorted to borrowing money at exorbitant rates to pay running expenses, resulting in the general crippling of business enterprise which doubt and uncertainty always lead to.

It was with these historical facts plainly in view that the Republicans of Massachusetts met in convention last October and adopted their platform. However, before referring to the position of Massachusetts Republicans on the tariff, I wish to thank my colleague [Mr. SULLIVAN] for his speech yesterday. It was one of those speeches which does no harm except to the maker's party, and it removed any doubt which existed as to the real views of the Massachusetts Democracy relative to labor. The Democratic party of Massachusetts has for more than twenty-five years in its party platforms declared its allegiance to the fixed and immutable principles of the national Democracy. Imagine such a thing as the national Democratic party having a fixed and immutable principle! It has declaimed against the extravagance of Republican administration in that State, and has pointed with pride to its record as the friend of the laboring man. Last year, by chance, aided by a liberal expenditure of money, they elected a Democratic governor, and it was anticipated that the extravagance and profligacy of Republican administrations, extending over a period of forty-five years, would be exposed without delay; but after months of searching the governor, an honest man, announced that he had hunted diligently for extravagance, but had failed to find it; that legislative appropriations had been kept to the lowest limit consistent with an efficient administration, and that, generally speaking, the State's affairs had been wisely and economically managed. Now comes my colleague and shatters another fixed and immutable principle—that of being the professional friend of the laboring man. It will give a shock to his constituents and to all the people of Massachusetts, where he has come to be considered a party leader, due to his recognized ability, that he now affirms that the laboring man in this country needs no protection. Therefore the only thing fixed and immutable left in the principles of the Massachusetts Democracy is their desire for office and incidentally to get the other party out. I can not leave this subject without recalling my colleague's impassioned appeal for the downtrodden farmer. It sounds like a cry from ancient history, and comes with peculiar appropriateness from my colleague, who represents a district in which there is not a foot of street, road, or alley which is not paved, a district which has not had a farmer among its residents since the Revolutionary war. His statement gave me a distinct shock, for it is a common and, I believe, a well-established impression that the farmers of this country have paid off their mortgages and are loaning money.

The tariff plank adopted by the Republican party of Massachusetts follows:

We believe that the policy of protection to American labor and American industry should be maintained.

The Republican party of Massachusetts reaffirms its devotion to the principle of protection, and is opposed to tariff changes tending to depress or destroy any of our industries, or to lower the wages of American labor. But we recognize the fact, as declared by the national Republican convention at Chicago, that rates should be changed when conditions have so changed that the public interest demands the alteration of schedules. The time at which revision of the tariff should be undertaken must be determined by the representatives of the party from all parts of our common country.

We approve the position taken by our Senators and Representatives at the last session of Congress in favor of present action, and we urge that they should continue to press upon their party associates in Congress from other States the wisdom of a consideration of the tariff for the purpose of revision and readjustment.

We further recommend for the consideration of Congress the enactment of a tariff provision which shall protect our exports against discrimination and secure to the United States the treatment accorded to the most-favored nations in all foreign markets.

If there is any straddle in that declaration it must be discovered by the man who uses language to conceal his intentions. To the Republicans of Massachusetts it means that we believe as firmly as ever in the policy of protection; but we believe that tariffs should be changed from time to time to meet conditions and we believe this is one of those times, so we are going to continue to call this fact to the attention of our fellow Republicans until action is taken.

But the fear of Democratic attempts to revise the tariff were only incidents among the reasons which prompted this action. It was taken notwithstanding a firm belief that the Dingley tariff was the most scientific and has proven the best tariff ever adopted by Congress, added to the knowledge that in many respects at least it is still, as a revenue producer and protector of labor, difficult to improve upon; but it is apparent to anyone in touch with the business affairs of this country that never in its history have there been such radical changes in the manner of conducting the public corporation or great transportation companies as have taken place in the last eight years, and that many of these changes have produced conditions which prevent the necessity for the continuance of the present schedules.

I shall be glad to take up this subject in detail at some more opportune time, but for the moment I will instance one example, the duty on hides, to illustrate the point which I wish to make. For twenty-five years there was no duty on hides, and if there were any necessity for it when the Dingley bill was enacted, I believe that necessity has passed; the control of the hide market has passed from the producer to the packer. I am doubtful whether the producer receives any benefit whatever from the duty, but in any case the tanners and manufacturers of shoes in Massachusetts believe that a removal of the duty will assist them to increase the exportation of shoes; and to remove any lurking fear that this is an entirely selfish move from which the consumer is to receive no benefit, I believe I am stating the substantially unanimous willingness of the shoemakers of Massachusetts in making the suggestion that they will gladly agree to a reduction of the duty on shoes equivalent to the amount removed from hides. In many cases the whole duty could be removed; in others, in the cheaper grades of shoes, less reduction should be made. This suggestion is not made in a haphazard way, but as the result of a canvas, and further it is believed that if the duty were entirely removed from hides and an equivalent amount from shoes that the shoemaker could easily continue to control this market and increase exportations in the next ten years from $8,000,000, exported last year, to $50,000,000, and as the labor item is about 25 per cent of the cost of shoes it follows that $10,000,000 from this source alone would be added to the wages of the laboring men of this country.

We have become, under the provisions of the Dingley bill, a great manufacturing nation, and such changes as the one I have mentioned will, in my judgment, secure what we have and provide an opening for a large increase.

The people of Massachusetts are not unmindful of the fact that there are now in this House, in the full strength of their capacity and possessing an experience which is invaluable, many of those men who were active, indeed vital factors, in framing the Dingley bill, and they want the benefit of the ripe experience of these men in the revised edition which would come from their hands.

The minority leader of this House stated on this floor the other day that the trouble with the people of this country was that they were tired of the Republican party and afraid of the Democratic party. I subscribe to the last part of that statement without hesitation or reservation, and I have a lurking fear that the first part may come true if we do not follow common business prudence and adopt ordinary business foresight in making repairs while they can be made safely and economically. The wise owner of a mill never delays replacing a doubtful piece of his machinery while his force is intact and competent to do the work, even though the necessary shut down may cause a temporary loss. He would be a fool to wait until his boiler had exploded, killing or crippling his engineer force and compelling him to resort to the inexperienced and inefficient to make his repairs or renewals. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know whether there is any other gentleman who wants to get in a short speech. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3 and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill (H. R. 10847) to treat the findings of the Court of Claims in certain cases as judgments and to provide for the payment of the same, was changed from the Committee on War Claims to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CHAPMAN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Nancy Day, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CLOSE OF GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew the request I made this morning to close general debate on the Philippine tariff bill at 5 o'clock on Saturday next and take up the bill on Monday under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. I shall object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the request to be to close general debate at 5 o'clock on Saturday evening, and that the bill be taken up on Monday morning under the five-minute rule. The request involves nothing else.

Mr. PAYNE. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as I am concerned. I am perfectly willing to agree to that.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I know that there are some gentlemen who were present this morning when the request was made who would object, and I suggest to the gentleman I will object at present. But he can bring it up in the morning before we go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the use of making a request in the morning if they are going to object? I do not understand that the gentleman objects.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG. I object at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I renew the notice that I gave this morning, that I will move on Monday to close debate on the bill. I now move that the House adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 12, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2159. An act authorizing the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Texas and Louisiana.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2159. An act authorizing the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company, its successors or assigns, to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Texas and Louisiana—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3; and pending that, I again ask unanimous consent that all general debate close to-morrow at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to close all general debate on House bill No. 3 to-morrow at 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I just want to state that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Democratic leader, told me that he was satisfied with that.

Mr. PAYNE. He stated so on the floor of the House yesterday.

Mr. YOUNG. Reserving the right to object, I suggest to the gentleman that he make it 12 o'clock on Monday, giving an opportunity, if it were thought wise, for the House to convene at an earlier hour than 12 o'clock on Monday. That would give a little more time.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to making it 12 o'clock Monday; that all general debate close at 12 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have not either.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if he knows whether that will permit all those who desire to speak on the question to be heard?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not know how that would be.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York that I desire to make a few remarks on this matter before debate is closed. I have no objection to expediting the matter as much as possible, but still I would like to have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman, who has the disposition of the time, knows more about that than anyone else. A greater opportunity to have a reasonable hearing in the time might be obtained if gentlemen limited their remarks to argument and not give so much time to politics.

Mr. NORRIS. I would have no objection to the matter being expedited.

Mr. PAYNE. And I would be willing that the House should meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow as well as on Monday.

Mr. NORRIS. I know not whether this will give time sufficient to gentlemen who ought to have a hearing, and I would dislike that agreement to be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that the other alternative will be the motion on Monday to close all general debate as soon as the House meets. We would not have an hour to-morrow morning or Monday morning. If the gentleman desires to be heard he would have a much better opportunity for a hearing if we make that kind of an agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to it, if I could be heard. I would like the chairman of the committee to state, if he can, what opportunity there will be.

Mr. OLMSTED. The number of gentlemen who will be heard will depend very largely upon the length of time which the committee itself, by unanimous consent, gives to those who are recognized.

It is absolutely impossible for the gentleman in the chair to control that, and if a gentleman on the floor asks the Chair for twenty minutes and is recognized for twenty minutes, and then at the expiration of the twenty minutes the committee extends his time indefinitely and he occupies three hours it is absolutely impossible for the occupant of the chair to tell how many other gentlemen will have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire how many are on the list and about what time they have asked for, and how it corresponds with the time remaining under this proposed arrangement.

Mr. OLMSTED. There are twelve gentlemen desiring to be heard against the bill and about twenty-five gentlemen desiring to be heard in favor of it.

Mr. NORRIS. This is a question which affects me directly. There are a number of sugar-beet factories in my State, and I desire to be heard on this question.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will state that the time asked for by the opponents of the bill amounts to about seven hours.

Mr. YOUNG. And how much for those in favor of it?

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, but I want to ask that my colleague [Mr. NORRIS] who probably is opposed to the bill, be allowed to be heard on this subject. He has in his district quite a large sugar industry, and I think it is nothing but fair, considering the fact that this debate has taken a long time and some gentlemen have talked two and three hours apiece, that he be allowed the time that he desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] modifies his request for unanimous consent, that all general debate close on this bill on Monday next at 12 o'clock and that to-morrow and on Monday the House meet at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I desire very much to be heard for a few minutes upon this bill. I am away at the foot of the list of speakers, and it seems to me that if consent is given to close debate on Monday at 12 o'clock I shall not have an opportunity to say one word.

Mr. PAYNE. Let me suggest that there is more likelihood of the gentleman being heard under this arrangement than there will be if I am compelled to make a motion to close debate.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is possibly true, but would it not be possible to extend the time until Tuesday?

Mr. PAYNE. That will be for the House to say. I shall make the motion on Monday, and gentlemen understanding that that course would be taken have gone away and will return on Monday with that end in view.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will suggest to the gentleman that the motion might be defeated, but I do not desire to place myself in the position of opposing the leader of the House, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman can get in unless unanimous consent is given to extend the time of other gentlemen who will speak before he does.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] informs me that I will get in under the arrangement suggested by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee if time is not extended to other speakers beyond that which they have already been promised; but unanimous consent to extend time is very easily obtained from the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I shall object to any extensions of time from now on while I am in the Hall of the House. If it is done, it will have to be done while I am momentarily absent. I think in justice to gentlemen who desire to speak and who have stated to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole what time they want, I shall have to object to any extension of time hereafter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to say, speaking for myself personally, that I should like to see every man who wants to make a speech about this bill have an opportunity to be heard. The debate has taken such a wide range and the House has been so very kind to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and myself, and the other Members on that committee, that we have, five or six of us, monopolized a great deal of time, and it will hardly give these other Members a fair deal unless they have what they wish in the way of time. That is my private opinion of it, speaking for myself. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

Mr. PAYNE. I renew the notice that I shall make a motion on Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal, to close debate on this bill, and shall press that motion to a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 3.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition submitted is to reduce the existing rates on sugar and tobacco coming into this country from the Philippine Islands to 25 per cent and to permit the free entry of sugar and tobacco grown in the United States into the Philippine Islands free of duty. There are provisions in the bill to which I shall make no reference for the reason that it is my purpose to deal only with the effect such reduction of the pending tariff rates will have upon sugar both coming into this country from the Philippines and going into the Philippines from this country. The Philippine tariff act of March 3, 1905, establishing tariff rates for the Philippine Islands provides that the tariff on raw sugar, gross weight, shall be $1.62 per hundred kilos, or $14.73 per ton, and upon refined sugars, net weight, $3 per hundred kilos, or $27.30 per ton. This tariff applies as well to sugar produced in this country as to sugar produced elsewhere in the world entering the Philippines. Under the existing tariff in this country, as fixed by what is known as the "Dingley tariff act," the duty on sugar imported into the United States, not above 16 Dutch standard and not above 75 polariscope, is 0.95 of a cent per pound, and an additional 0.035 of a cent per pound for every additional degree of the polariscope.

This would, therefore, make sugar not above 16, Dutch standard, of 96 polariscope test, $1.68½ per hundred, or $33.70 per ton. This 96 sugar corresponds with the "raw sugar" referred to in the Philippine tariff act, and upon which we placed, in the Philippines, a tariff of $14.73 a ton. The proposition, therefore, to reduce the tariff on sugar coming into this country from the Philippines to 25 per cent of the tariff rates on the same grade of sugar would be a reduction of that rate from $33.70 to $8.42 per ton. So that 96 test, or raw sugar coming into the United States from the Philippines after the passage of this bill, shall pay $8.42 per ton, giving that sugar an advantage over the same grade of sugar produced anywhere else of $25.28 per ton. It follows that if a ton of Philippine sugar landed in the United States costs a tariff of $8.42 a ton, and the $8.42 after being collected by the Government of the United States is turned over into the treasury of the Philippine Islands, that the Filipino sugar producer has the advantage over the world in the American market exactly equivalent to the entire tariff on that grade of sugar; that is $33.70, of which $25.28 is his advantage in the market, and $8.42 is a contribution by the people of the United States toward the maintenance of his government. He will then find it profitable to manage his output of sugar in the following way: Ship it to the United States, secure $8.42 in the shape of revenue for his government, secure an advantage of $25.28 for himself, replace the same ton of sugar with a corresponding grade of sugar from Java or Santo Domingo or South America, pay $14.75 a ton duty into the Philippine Islands on this latter sugar, get this sum again into his treasury to relieve him of taxation, and by that transaction have the same quantity and the same quality of sugar for his own consumption as he had originally, he will have cleared a profit for himself of $10.53 a ton, and will have placed in the treasury of the Philippine government $23.17, which will go to relieve him of taxes to his government. Or a Java sugar producer could ship into the Philippines an equal quantity of sugar to that produced by the Filipino sugar producer, pay the tariff of $14.75 into the Philippine treasury, exchange that sugar for Philippine sugar, import it into the United States, pay the $8.42 duty and clear $10.53 per ton on the transaction.

It will pay the Java producer to make this trade, because he clears over and above any other profits he may have in the production of sugar $10.53 per ton. And it will pay the Filipino sugar producer to make the trade, for the reason that he will lose nothing, having the same quantity of sugar of the same grade as that which he gives in exchange, plus $8.42 and $14.75, into the treasury of the islands, which to that extent relieves him of the burden of taxation to administer the affairs of the islands.

No one, therefore, can doubt but that with these advantages no producer of sugar in the Philippine Islands would be foolish enough to consume a pound of his product, but that every pound produced there will find its way into the United States and all sugars consumed in the Philippine Islands will be bought in the markets of the world outside of the United States.

This argument is predicated upon the correctness of the position of the gentlemen who are advocating this measure. But they are entirely wrong in their calculations, and no such result will be reached. The only advantage that will accrue to the Filipino sugar producer out of this measure will be his release from taxation to administer the affairs of his government to the extent that $8.42 a ton on the number of tons produced in the islands will be to the entire amount necessary to properly run his government, and the further advantage that he will not be burdened with the collection of this tax, but that the American people will not only pay the tax into his treasury but defray the expense of the collection. That the Filipino sugar producer will get no more advantage and the American consumer will get no more advantage is apparent from the following facts: No sugars come into this country above 96 polariscope, and no other consumer is found in this country for that grade of sugar except the American sugar refiners.

Now, it is a well-established fact that a person will always buy where he can buy cheapest and will always sell where he can sell dearest. He will no more voluntarily pay more than the cheapest price for what he needs than he would sell what he has to dispose of at a less price than the highest figure obtainable. It follows if the American refiner is the only purchaser of imported 96 sugar, he is also the only seller of refined sugar, barring, of course, the production of beet sugar in the West, which when manufactured is a refined sugar.

The intent of the Dingley Act was to give the American refiner what is known as a "differential," and that differential consists of the difference between sugar testing 96 and what is known as "refined sugar." That amounts to the difference between $1.68½ and $1.82½, which is the difference between 96 sugars and 100 sugars, or 14 points, or $2.80 a ton. And the difference between 100 sugars and what is arbitrarily called in the tariff act "refined sugars," which pay a duty of $1.95, is 12½ points, or $2.50 per ton, making a total differential of $5.30 per ton. The purchaser of raw and refined sugars must pay the world's price for raw and refined sugar plus the tariff imposed upon raw and refined sugar by the country wherein it is consumed.

I eliminated in that statement the cost of transportation and marine insurance, for the reason that all 96 sugars coming into this country must pay transportation and marine insurance, and therefore it can be taken out of consideration for the purposes of this argument. The purchaser of all the raw sugar is the American sugar refiner, and the seller of all refined sugar in this country is the American sugar refiner. So that if conditions were permitted to continue as they were originally intended in 1897, what is known as the "differential," or the profit of the American refiner, is the difference between the tariff on raw and on refined sugar, or $5.30 for every ton brought into this country by the American refiner refined and sold to the American consumer.

It follows that if the tariff on refined sugar remains as it is, and the tariff on raw sugar is reduced, the differential is increased, and the profit of the American sugar refiner is likewise increased. And the greater the difference between the tariff on the raw and the tariff on the refined, the greater the profit of the American sugar refiner. It is true that reducing the tariff on raw sugar coming from the Philippines from $33.70, as fixed in the Dingley law, to $8.42 as it is proposed to fix it in this bill, makes a reduction of the raw sugar of $25.28 per ton. So that to that extent the American refiner finds additional profit in buying that sugar, refining it and disposing of it on the market in this country. His differential on that sugar will not be $5.30, but his differential will be $5.30 plus $25.28, or $30.58 for every ton of sugar produced in the Philippine Islands. A differential almost equivalent to the entire tariff on 96 sugars entering this country.

Now, I have shown that it will not pay the Philippine sugar planter to consume a pound of his sugar, so that by this bill you compel him, in order to get the advantage of the tariff you are conceding him when you give him $8.42, which you charge to the American people for the benefit of the Philippine Government, to sell his sugar to the only purchaser of his grade of sugar in the United States—the American sugar refiner.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen advocating this bill on this floor have repeatedly expressed not only a willingness but a desire to remove the differential on sugar, and, in the event of a successful effort to so remove that differential, to vote against this proposition. But they contend that they can not remove the differential, and they conclude that they will vote for the passage of this bill. The logic of that argument is that if they can not remove so insignificant a sum as $5.30 a ton differential on sugar, to kill the sugar trust, they are willing to concede them a further differential of $25.28. And from that argument they can not get away. But if, Mr. Chairman, the Filipino sugar producer is not permitted to consume the sugar he has himself produced, so also by a committee amendment will he not eventually be permitted to consume any other sugar, except that purchased from the same American sugar refiner. The amendment reads as follows:

That in consideration of the rates of duty aforesaid sugar and tobacco, both manufactured and unmanufactured, wholly the growth and product of the United States, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands free of duty.

Now, when the committee put that amendment in this bill, it knew full well that not a pound of American-produced sugar would find its way to the Philippine market. And the reason of that is this: Porto Rico and Hawaii, producers of 96° sugars, will not ship their sugars to the Philippine Islands, because they bring their sugar free into the markets of the United States, where it receives the protection of $33.70 per ton against the sugars of the world.

To ship it into the Philippine Islands would be to ship it into a market which affords only $14.74 a ton tariff duty. This applies to the Louisiana producer as well as to the Porto Rican and Hawaiian sugar producers. Neither will the beet-sugar producer ship his sugars there because he sells it on a market where it is produced, affording him $39 a ton tariff, and to ship it to the Philippines would be to place it on a market affording him only $27.30 a ton of tariff duty. And these are the only sugars that are the product and manufacture of the United States contemplated in this amendment. It would seem, therefore, on its face, that this is a harmless proposition. But not so. The purpose of the amendment is that whenever the production of sugar from the United States proper, from Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and Cuba shall exceed the quantity of sugar consumed in the United States the American sugar refiner should have an additional profit, as follows: The American sugar refiner would then take the surplus of the cheapest sugar he buys, which is the free sugar of Hawaii and Porto Rico and Louisiana, refine it, send it to the Philippine Islands without duty and sell it on a market with $27.30 tariff protection against the world, and to the extent of the consumption of sugar by the Philippine people this refiner will have an additional market, without a competitor in the world, for the surplus sugar over and above the production of those islands as compared with the consumption of the United States. It is, therefore, the laying of a foundation for a new market for the sugar trust which is bound to happen in the near future with the great impetus that is being given in Porto Rico, Hawaii, Cuba, and the Philippines by such legislation as this.

In other words, the American sugar refiner operates in this way: He first takes the cheapest sugar he can buy, which is 96° sugars on which there is no tariff for entry into the United States—the Louisiana, Hawaii, and Porto Rican production. He will then take the next cheapest sugar, which is the Philippine output, with a tariff of $8.42, and will then take the Cuban sugar, which is the next cheapest sugar, with a 20 per cent reduction under the treaty between this country and the Cuban Republic, or a tariff of $26.96. And when these sugars shall have supplied more than is necessary to meet the consumption of the people of the United States, he will be in a position to compel the Philippine people to buy only his sugar by refining the cheapest sugar he gets, placing it on the Philippine market, supplying the deficiency by additional draft on Cuba at a reduced rate and get the differential growing out of the 20 per cent reduction under the treaty. Under this bill he secures both markets in advance of a surplus production for the American people.

Our friends on this side of the Chamber who are so solicitous and emphatic in their desire to rid themselves of the Philippine Islands are now engaged in an effort to so better the conditions there, supply the treasury of those islands, relieve the people thereof of all taxation, tax the American people to carry on their government, giving them the protection of this great Republic, furnish its Army and Navy for its protection, all in the hope that when all of these things shall have been granted they will chafe under this pampering treatment and become very solicitous of being freed from the domination of this Republic. They know that in this country men vote their commercial advantages, as a rule, and yet they seek to establish commercial relations between the people of this country and the people of the Philippine government that will make it not only not desirable by a great number of the people of this country to be rid of the Philippines, but make it a distinct advantage to hold on to them.

But, Mr. Chairman, some time ago a proposition was presented to this Congress to permit the President of the United States to negotiate a treaty with Cuba, under which the tariff on sugar coming from the island of Cuba into this country should receive a reduction of 20 per cent on the tariff imposed on a like grade of sugar coming into the country from elsewhere. In order to permit this treaty to be negotiated it became necessary to pass an enabling act, and on December 19, 1903, Congress passed such an act, in which the following appears:

Provided, That while said convention is in force no sugar imported from the Republic of Cuba, and being the product of the soil or industry of the Republic of Cuba, shall be admitted into the United States at a reduction of duty greater than 20 per cent of the rates of duty thereon, as provided by the tariff act of the United States approved July 24, 1897, and no sugar the product of any other foreign country shall be admitted by treaty or convention into the United States while this convention is in force at a lower rate of duty than that provided by the tariff act of the United States approved July 24, 1897.

Under this enabling act and the treaty growing out of it, the Cuban producer receives the advantage of 20 per cent reduction on 96° sugar shipped by it into the United States. So that instead of paying $33.70 a ton, it is paying only $26.96. Now, Congress committed itself and this Government committed itself to the policy, by the provision above cited, not to change the tariff on sugar coming from any foreign country pending the existence of that treaty. The clear purpose of that policy was to assure the American sugar producer that if permitted to negotiate this treaty it would thereafter be the policy of the Government not to further interfere with their business by changing the tariff on sugar. And it was an assurance to the Cuban Government that if it negotiated such a treaty it would be permitted the advantage which the bill provided against all other competitors in the world growing the same grade of sugar.

The Philippine Islands at that time belonged to this country. The Supreme Court had decided that it was foreign territory to the United States for all purposes of taxation. The Cuban producer therefore had a right to expect that good faith should be kept both by the Congress and by the American Government, to continue the advantage which it secured in the reciprocity treaty just referred to. Your reduction under this bill of the tariff on sugar that is a competitor to Cuban sugar to $8.42 grants the Filipino sugar producer an advantage of $18.54 over the Cuban producer in the markets of the United States. The Cuban producer has a right in law and morals to expect at the hands of Congress and this Government an equal treatment to that you propose to grant the Filipino people; and at the next session of Congress—nay, perhaps at this session of Congress—the Cuban producer will be found here clamoring for a like advantage to that given the Filipino sugar grower in the American market by the passage of this act.

I have been here not so very long, but I have never attended a session of Congress that these gentlemen were not here asking some reduction on raw sugars. I have seen a demand made by Congress for reduction of the tariff on refined sugar but once, and the host that was behind the proposition to reduce Cuban 96 sugars 50 per cent of the existing rate disappeared in an instant the moment the differential was taken off. With the regularity of the taxgatherer, at every Congress since this sublime doctrine of manifest destiny became fashionable, a cry of distress has been heard from some dark fastness and charity solicited as the cure for the distress. Then some disciples, conceiving themselves especially anointed to relieve the distress by dispensing charity, have appeared upon the floor of the House, and, Mr. Chairman, with what magnanimity have these dispensed this charity! They heard this cry of distress when Hawaii sought annexation to this country, and some of us, acquiescing in their charitable inclinations, denying the genuineness of this cry of distress, said: "If it be charity you are bent upon, take the wherewith out of our common purse, but do not dispense this charity at our exclusive expense."

But, Mr. Chairman, they said: "Oh, it won't hurt you; they produce little sugar there; it is not a drop in the bucket." And they dispensed the charity at our expense.

They heard it when Porto Rico sought a reduced tariff to obtain a superior market, and later when it sought free entry to our ports. And some of us, acquiescing in their charitable inclinations, denying each time the genuineness of the cry of distress, said: "If it be charity you are bent upon, take the wherewith out of our common purse, but don't dispense this charity at our exclusive expense."

But, Mr. Chairman, they said each time: "Oh, it won't hurt you; they produce little sugar there; it isn't a drop in the bucket." And they dispensed the charity—at our expense.

They heard it in 1902 when Cuba sought a 50 per cent reduction on its sugar into this country. And some of us, acquiescing in their charitable inclinations, denying the genuineness of the cry of distress, said: "If it be charity you are bent upon, take the wherewith out of our common purse, but don't dispense this charity at our exclusive expense."

But, Mr. Chairman, they said: "Oh, it won't hurt you; they produce little sugar there; it isn't a drop in the bucket." And we took off the differential on sugar, and, in a moment of forgetfulness and absent-mindedness, they forgot to dispense charity that year.

They heard it in 1903 when Cuba sought a 20 per cent reduction on its sugar into this country. And some of us, acquiescing in their charitable inclinations, denying the genuineness of the cry of distress, said: "If it be charity you are bent upon, take the wherewith out of our common purse, but don't dispense the charity at our exclusive expense."

But, Mr. Chairman, they said: "Oh, it won't hurt you; they produce little sugar there; it isn't a drop in the bucket."

And we did not take off the differential on sugar, and in a moment they dispensed the charity—at our expense.

They heard it when the Philippines sought a reduction of 25 per cent on their sugar coming into this country. And some of us, acquiescing in their charitable inclinations, denying the genuineness of the cry of distress, said: "If it be charity you are bent upon, take the wherewith out of our common purse, but don't dispense this charity at our exclusive expense."

But, Mr. Chairman, they said: "Oh, it won't hurt you; they produce little sugar there; it isn't a drop in the bucket." And they dispensed the charity and we bore the burden.

They hear it now when the Filipinos seek a reduction of 75 per cent on their sugar coming into this country. And some of us say to them: "We acquiesce in your charitable inclinations; we deny the genuineness of the cry of distress, but if it be charity you are bent upon let's take the wherewith out of the common purse, but don't dispense this charity at our exclusive expense."

Will they hear us, Mr. Chairman? If we take off the differential on sugar they must; otherwise I fear that charity will be dispensed and the burden will be borne by only a few of our citizens.

Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen of honorable intentions, of charitable proclivities, and of superb liberalities must stop and learn that some of us are countrymen indeed. But we have attended our first circus. We have met the fakir man, the mountebank, and the gold-brick man, and we may have perhaps paid the price to learn, but we have learned. We don't object to being buncoed even now and pay the price provided the game is smart. But we are tired, oh, Mr. Chairman, so tired, of being continually, regularly, annually buncoed in the same old game with the same old paraphernalia.

We would like a new game, and if we must have the game and pay the price, let the game be at least smart and entertaining and instructive.

We are tired of this old game, for the reason that while we all seem to play it, only a few are made to defray the expenses of the game.

But perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I am all wrong in this. It may be a mere coincidence that since "manifest destiny" has obtained possession of the national soul, and we dispense charity, some of us must put up the charitable fund while others do the dispensing.

This may be a mere coincidence. I am reminded of what I believe was first said upon the floor of this House, that if a person throws five sixes once, it is a strange performance; if he throws it twice in succession, it is unusual; if three times in succession, it is suspicious, and if he throws it four times consecutively, the dice are loaded. If we are going to divide our cake with some people who it is claimed have not any, let us all put up equally, but do not take it out of mine and then try to demonstrate that I have as much left after as I had before you divided mine. It is bad enough for you to do the deed without reflecting on my intelligence by attempting to prove to me that I have lost nothing by the transaction. Perhaps, who knows, Mr. Chairman, but that at night as he retires, this dispenser of charity at other people's expense may not find reason to pray, "O Lord, I thank Thee that I am not as other men." Mr. Chairman, in this discussion I have sought to show what advantages would accrue to the Filipinos as a result of the adoption of the pending measure.

I think that I have demonstrated that he will receive nothing beyond this $8.64 which the American people will have to pay in order to help him run his government and to relieve him from taxation; that all the balance of it will fall into the hands of the sugar manufacturers of the country. I think I have shown that under our treaty relations with Cuba and under the act enabling the President of the United States to enact the treaty with Cuba that Cuba will be at the doors of this Congress at the next session—nay, perhaps at this very session—asking that we live up to our treaty obligations and give her equal chance in the markets of this country, and that while we will gain nothing by this transaction except the privilege of shielding the people of those islands with our Army and our Navy—while we gain nothing but the poor privilege of taxing ourselves for the purpose of maintaining their Government—we turn around and give additional profits of many times that value to the only individual interested in the purchase of cheap raw sugar, the American sugar refiner. I think I have shown these things, and, having shown them, I believe it becomes the duty of this body, legislating for the people of this country, to call a halt to this charity business, which, after all, is charity which does not go to help either the producers or consumers of this Republic, but falls into the coffers of those who make money without producing anything at all, but thrive most upon other people's substance.

I think that it is time that those who are engaged in the production of sugar in this country, those who are engaged in the production of beets, those who are engaged in the production of cane in this country should get a hearing at the hands of Congress. I think that those who come at every session of Congress seeking to reduce the price of the raw sugar which enters into the manufacture of the refined sugar, should call a halt. And this Congress, for once, should legislate on this question in behalf of the American man engaged in the production of sugar instead of, under the guise of charity, legislating for the savage or semicivilized man in the Tropics, but in reality in behalf of the sugar trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

[Mr. SMITH of Arizona addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had instructed him to report that they had further considered the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3, and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed on Monday at 5 o'clock, and that the House meet on Saturday and Monday at 11 o'clock for debate on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all general debate be closed on House bill No. 3 on Monday next at 5 o'clock, and that on Saturday, tomorrow, and on Monday next the House meet at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want to understand this thing now. Does the gentleman say that debate is to run until 5 o'clock Monday, and in the meantime the House is to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and on Monday, instead of at 12?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then it is taken up under the five-minute rule?

Mr. PAYNE. On Tuesday morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, after a week's debate upon this subject, perhaps it might well be asked, of what advantage is it to prolong further discussion, and what useful purpose can be subserved by the argument? Judging, however, by the remarks which have been heard upon this floor, we who are opposed to this bill at this time have signally failed to remove some of the misapprehension that seems to be current. We have also failed, I think, to make our position entirely clear.

In 1896 it was my pleasure to travel for two days in the West, with an expert from the German Government. He represented an association of German sugar-beet growers. He was a highly cultured, widely travelled Alsatian gentleman, and he seemed to be admirably adapted to the work he had to do. He was a chemist and a soil physicist, and he was evidently particularly apt in matters of practical science. He was vouched for by the German Government, whose commission he bore. He was just returning from California, where he had been, as well as through the rest of the country, on a mission from his employers for the purpose of investigating the American beet-sugar situation. And he was going back to his people with a story about like this: That outside of Los Angeles County, Cal., Conejos County, Colo., and a little section of the Pecos Valley, New Mexico, there was no area in the United States where sugar beets could be grown sufficiently successfully, on a commercial scale, to become a feature in the world's production or to appear as a factor in competition with the German output.

The gentleman had about the same broad, far-seeing, sympathetic view of the American industry that some of the gentlemen upon this floor seem to have, who would now subordinate it to the interests of some wards of ours on the other side of the globe; wards who, if we may credit the statements which have been made, are hardly emerged from barbarism and are engaged in a moribund industry that must fail, without we give them the heritage of our own children, access to the best markets of the world. We are asked in their behalf to menace, or, at least, to retard, and, in my judgment, to seriously injure, an industry which means more to the economic welfare of great areas of the United States than does any other single form of agriculture.

We are asked to do this by a committee consisting of gentlemen who are among the most able, the most conscientious, the most distinguished in service in this House. They are, doubtless, thoroughly conscientious and thoroughly devoted to the public interests in the position that they take. They, or the majority of them, come from districts wherein are located industrial enterprises, which have grown strong and prosperous because of the wise and prudent fiscal legislation which we have inaugurated in this country. They themselves have played a prominent part in building up the wonderful prosperity that has marked and has been characteristic of our industrial system. They are vastly proud of the growth of their iron and of their steel industries, of their factories, and of their hundreds of thousands of contented and prosperous employees, and we join with them in their pæan. But they seem to have no place in their hearts for the beet and cane sugar industries or for the tobacco culture of a dozen States.

Filled with an exquisite compassion for the Moro and the Tagal, for the Igorrote and the Visayan, their hearts are steeled to the planters of Louisiana and the tobacco growers of Pennsylvania, of Wisconsin, and of Connecticut; steeled also to the sugar-beet grower of Michigan and of Colorado. They are very careful lest through any slip of theirs in the drafting of this bill, any of the products of the manufactories of England and Germany shall find access to our market through a Philippine byway. They are very careful to protect their own interests in our markets, but they are entirely willing that there shall be sacrificed on the altar of what they call "national duty," and righteousness, the interests of these great American agricultural communities. They are extremely willing, are these gentlemen, to pay their debt of conscience to the little brown brother in the coin of beet sugar and tobacco. But I hear no suggestion of a compensating advantage to these industries, however much their own individual feelings may be relieved. I do not question their good faith and I do not question their devotion to the whole country, but I do question, and seriously, question, their breadth of view.

I do not believe that the American people want this done. I do not believe that this House for one moment would take this step if they appreciated the real conditions. It is our fault that you do not, but even if this were not the case, it would be small compensation for the beet-sugar growers that we could charge you with the responsibility for it. There would be small compensation in that for ruined industries, blighted prospects, and arrested industrial development.

When the German expert I spoke of was in this country there were then but four experimental beet-sugar plants in operation in America. Their output was comparatively hardly more than a laboratory test. There are now fifty-three factories in operation (I think my figures are exact) and three closed, a total of fifty-six. Their output this year was over 300,000 tons, approximately 325,000 tons of beet sugar, more than half of our total sugar production. The value of that output was more than $30,000,000.

I do not want to speak locally only, or to present the interest of a single section; but twelve of these factories are in the State which I represent, and therefore, so far as this industry is concerned, Colorado is a type of a very large area which is very much interested in the culture of sugar beets; practically of all that country that lies west of the one hundredth meridian. What can be done in Colorado can be done in every other part of this arid or semiarid region, with the possible exception of the land that lies in the extreme north; and whatever vitally concerns that great section of this country vitally concerns the whole country.

There is one phase of this subject that has been very little touched upon thus far. This Government is now carrying on a great work and expending a vast accumulating fund, now amounting to over $30,000,000, in the development of that region, in providing homes for the coming millions, a safety valve for, and a refuge from the overcrowded cities of the East. It is doing this through the work of the Reclamation Service.

I am well within the bounds of fact when I say that, in a large portion of the region covered by the operation of this Service the beet-sugar industry is the most certain guaranty of the success of the experiment. Outside the region of the Pacific slope it is absolutely necessary that some intensive product readily convertible into money be grown on this irrigated land, a product the cost of production of which is reduced to a minimum, and with regard to which the handicap of distance from market is eliminated to the greatest degree possible.

Very many of the reclamation projects now under contemplation, when completed will represent an acre cost of from $25 to $35; add to this the expense of ditching, clearing, and preparation of the land and its initial value, and you have an investment of from $40 to $50 an acre, and in some places more. Such land can not successfully compete, in such amounts as the Hydrographic Survey proposes to reclaim, with the prairies of Iowa, Illinois, and the Central West if it has to rely on the great staples alone. This is a very serious feature of this subject.

At present the local market consumes enough of the crops so that, with the very limited areas available under present irrigating facilities the irrigated lands are highly valuable, and the prices are well maintained. This will not be the case when the irrigated areas are multiplied ten, twenty, or fifty fold and it becomes necessary to find a market for the wheat and the oats and the potatoes in Chicago and New York.

I speak in all seriousness when I say that I am thoroughly convinced that the hope of the work of reclamation lies in the farming of small tracts with highly productive crops, readily convertible into money in the immediate vicinity of their production.

For instance, to-day, in the Grand River Valley, in Colorado, with the small areas valuable for irrigation, fruit land has a market value of from six to twelve hundred dollars per acre. But when the few thousand acres at present irrigated become one or two hundred thousand, as they easily may become, this high-cost land must seek other sources of income. There will be no adequate market for the fruit raised, and you can not grow corn, wheat, or other staples on this ground with success, with a market one or two thousand miles away. Beet sugar is ideally fitted for this work, and the 3,000,000 tons of sugar annually consumed in this country offers a safe and sure market. Every irrigated valley in the arid region can and should support from three to half a dozen factories, with an equal number of prosperous, progressive, and intelligent communities. If you simply let this industry alone for a while, there is not only a probability, but almost a certainty, that in another ten years the intermountain region alone, will supply an annual demand for more than 1,500,000 tons of refined sugar.

In the six years that the industry has been in operation in Colorado it has grown so that to-day there are more than 85,000 acres under cultivation, but this is only 132 square miles, only a tithe of the land available in that State alone. It supports about 10,000 employees, and it distributed to the farmers this year nearly four and three-quarter millions of dollars. It produced in that State, in the year just closed, 95,000 tons of refined sugar. The fourteen other States and Territories of the intermountain region, west of the ninety-eighth meridian, need only to equal this record and a full half of the present domestic consumption will be supplied, and they can easily do it.

What this new enterprise means can not be appreciated unless one sees the actual results. In more than one place in my State the factories have been built in what was entirely unoccupied territory, and upon the bare and uncultivated plains have grown up ideal, prosperous communities, with all the concomitants of rapidly developing American civilization.

Where five years ago there was little but sagebrush and buffalo grass, and the herds roamed at their will, to-day there are banks, libraries, schools, and churches, and all that marks our best industrial development in the older localities. This result has been wholly due to the beet-sugar industry, and there is no wonder that our people are interested in it.

The growth of the beets is fairly remunerative to the farmer; but not by any means to the extent that you have been led to believe. It is an expensive crop to grow. It represents an acre cost of from $30 to $35. The average yield in beets last year was 11 tons, making an average value, at $5 per ton, of $55; but that average is made up of a few startlingly successful instances, very many cases of moderate profits, and quite too many failures. It can not, as a rule, be carried on by individuals on a large scale.

The average unit of cultivation in Colorado per individual owner is about 15 acres, and the proportion of profit seems to decrease as acreage increases. It is essentially for the great majority a supplemental, money-raising crop, affording excellent opportunities for crop rotation, and stimulating intensive cultivation in small areas.

The fifty-six factories already built in this country have paid to the districts represented by the gentlemen from Ohio and Pennsylvania a round $30,000,000, and if the gentlemen from Ohio and Pennsylvania will keep their hands off, ten years more will see $50,000,000 additional spent in the same direction.

It is mildly interesting to note in this connection that all our vaunted trade with the Philippine Islands reached in imports this year a total of about fifteen millions, and five millions in exports, only a fraction of the value of this single industry annually.

I can not say that I believe that the proposed measure will destroy it. I do believe, and am thoroughly convinced that I am justified in believing, that, if this bill becomes a law, we shall see no new beet-sugar factories in this country for many years, and that only those at present built which are most favorably located, and are operated under the best possible conditions can survive. Those who should know better than I go further and say that the injury will be much more serious, and that the industry will be ruined.

In this connection I want to call attention to a statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in opening this debate. You will recall that he called careful attention to the fact that a gentleman from Louisiana was absent; that that gentleman, named Hill, knew more about the cane-sugar industry than any other man in the United States; that he had always been present before the Committee on Ways and Means when hearings on this subject were in progress; that he was thoroughly reliable and thoroughly responsible; that he had been the great spokesman of the cane-sugar industry, but that this time he was not here, although he had been one of that pleasant party that had gone to the Philippines and enjoyed that delightful outing and had come back shouting for the Moro and the Tagal. And the impression was rather left on our minds that Mr. Hill of Louisiana had been converted to the cause of Philippine sugar or else had no facts to meet the statements that were made in behalf of it.

I have in my hand the copy of a telegram from that gentleman:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., January 5, 1906.

D. D. COLCOCK,
Arlington Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Colonel Hill has just come to the office and requested me to send the following:

"Am more opposed to Philippine tariff reduction to-day than last January, as I foresee the certainty of the islands being exploited and developed to the ruin of our home industries."

C. A. FARWELL.

[Applause.]

Now, the only reason for which I introduce this message is because the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] seems now to count Mr. Hill as an authority, by inference, for the proposition he is advancing.

We have had a good deal of the deadly parallel in this debate, and past records have been drawn with something of embarrassment to gentlemen who have been long in public life. Now, it is entirely true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says, that consistency is a jewel that men who have been long in public life must sometimes dispense with; but the gentleman in his speech yesterday alluded to the fact that there was another gentleman interested in the beet-sugar industry who was also supposed to have perhaps recanted. He made long extracts and quotations from a speech of Mr. Oxnard, in which he said in effect that the Philippine product never could become an important competitor with the American product, and that the beet-sugar industry and the cane-sugar industry had nothing to fear from the Filipinos.

The gentleman might have gone further, and he might have stated, if he chose, that at the time that speech was made it was the Porto Rican tariff and not the Philippine tariff that was under consideration, and that at that time the full Dingley rates obtained against the Philippines, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] were loudest in their protestations that the Philippine tariff never would be reduced and never should be reduced if they could help it.

Then you will recall that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] made some very interesting comments about some experiments which the Department of Agriculture is conducting in developing unicellular or single-germ beet seed, and he talked much about the report of a gentleman named Palmer, drawing from it the conclusion that the unicellular beet seed was an established fact. He was trying to show that because of this supposed fact the cost of producing beet sugar would be so much reduced that it needed no protection. Now, if he had read from page 166 of the same little book that he had, "Condition of the Beet Sugar Industry for 1904," he would have seen the latest authoritative governmental expression about unicellular beet seed. You remember that they take selected unicellular seeds from a great many ordinary samples and then plant them, and they then select out the plants which produce unicellular seed, and this is the result:

> The seed from each of these plants was kept separate and the percentage of single-germ seeds produced by 10 of these plants has been determined by actual count and found to lie between 8.2 and 25 per cent, with an average for the 10 plants of 14.3 per cent. * * *
> It is apparent, therefore, that the percentage of single-germ seed has been greatly increased in one generation by selecting single-germ seeds for the production of seed beets. It is the expectation of those having the work in charge to continue along the same line with the hope that by careful selection for several generations it will be possible to produce plants bearing only single-germ seeds.

Does that sound very much like the painting of the rose and adorning the lily that characterized the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] on this subject? There is simply the hope that after many years science may help the farmers in this respect, but it is all a prospect as yet.

But this whole argument strikes me as rather unique. I can imagine the gentleman from Pennsylvania going before some Ways and Means Committee of which he is not a member and making a plea for an adequate measure of protection for the iron and steel industries. I can imagine, also, some sugar-beet man coming and saying: "My dear sir, you don't want any protection; you are one of the dominant American race that will never yield to the competition of the nerveless inferior. With your restless energy you will never allow yourself to be outstripped in the contest for supremacy. You need fear no competition; but go and invent a unicellular boiler and attach to it an automatic device for self-cleaning flues, put in sets of tandem turbines, utilize your by-product, use your scrap iron and put on a smoke-consuming device that will utilize the surplus carbon, and you won't need any protection. What you need is improved methods." [Laughter.] I can imagine the reply of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to an argument of that sort. [Laughter.]

It is a critical situation that confronts us. A great industry of the American people is being threatened, and the only excuse they make, the only apology they make, is that the Philippine competition is so small that it never can be a factor. That is a matter of inference from some very conflicting data.

It is very true, as my colleague stated, that these hearings would prove anything; that you could read them in every conceivable way, and make out anything from the testimony in them. It is also true, as the gentleman from New York said, that a declaration against interest is the highest kind of testimony. Again, it is true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said, that it is our duty as legislators to weigh this testimony and see what it really means. I want, therefore, very briefly to call your attention not to what the enthusiasts for beet sugar say, not to what the Filipino says, but to the declarations against interest that appear in these hearings.

As I have already said, first of all they start out with the proposition,—and the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Connecticut elaborated it extensively and with considerable effect,—that there is no fear of Filipino competition, because there is not land enough there. They said there were 7,000,000 acres only, of agricultural land out of 73,000,000 acres in the islands, and they cited in support of that proposition the Philippine census, at page 181.

Ordinarily such a statement would not be particularly important, but these gentlemen have made it the basis of rather fundamental claims in this discussion.

The deduction, however, is not warranted by the census, upon which they rely. The totals furnished in the Philippine census in the fourth volume, beginning at page 181, do not refer, according to their own language, to arable land as distinguished from nonarable areas. They cover simply agricultural farming land, held as such by farmers, without discussing the possibility of extending the arable areas in the remainder.

The figures given show that approximately 10 per cent of the 73,000,000 acres of the islands is such agricultural and farming land.

If the gentleman from Connecticut while he was learning that lesson which he taught to us so admirably had troubled to turn over to the next page of the census he would have seen that there was no attempt to state total arable lands, for this same total of 7,000,000 acres is given as the total of the 815,000 individual farms, held and occupied by farmers as such; the only difference being that in one place the area is given in hectares and in the other in ares.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman claim that the totals represent the land under cultivation?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I claim that it represents the farming land held and occupied as such and has no reference whatever to the agricultural lands,—the arable lands, except those occupied as farming lands. If the gentleman had gone further and read the text he would have been in no doubt about it. Now, I do not care to rest this on my own deduction, but I have here in my hand a letter from the Director of the Census, which I will read:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, January 10, 1906.

Hon. F. E. BROOKS,
House of Representatives U. S., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your personal request of yesterday afternoon, with reference to Tables 1 to 18, Volume IV of the Philippine Census, I beg to advise you as follows:

Table 1, page 181 of the said volume, and the totals therein mentioned refer to, first, the total area of the islands, 29,791,734 hectares; second, the area in farms and occupied as such, 2,827,704 hectares. The succeeding tables referring to agricultural lands have reference to the same total farm area.

The friar lands, so called, and the Government lands are not included in the total agricultural lands, nor are the figures for agricultural lands supposed to include the entire area of arable lands in the islands.

Very respectfully, S. N. NORTH, Director.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, if the gentleman from Colorado will pardon me a moment, if he will read the reference on page 199, where, on the same year in which this census was taken, the total agricultural area is given, and then in the next column is the amount under cultivation, the gentleman from Colorado will see that he is mistaken about that. The area in farms is so small that they have included in agricultural lands the kitchen gardens.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. They have, and they have included the forested farms, but they do not include the friars' land.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. They must have included so much of the friars' land as was agricultural, for they have reported the entire amount of the land under cultivation.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The gentleman must be in error in regard to that. I think we will let the census rest where the men who made it put it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think we had better.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. And we will leave the condition of the Philippine Islands just as nature left them. Great, splendid, tropical islands, boundlessly fertile, admirably adapted to culture of cane sugar, with nobody knows how much agricultural land there; and as to the possibilities for sugar, we will leave them where the Secretary of War left them:

I have no doubt there is land enough there, if sugar is properly cultivated, to raise,—well, I don't know how much Cuba can raise, but if conditions favor us, we are going to be a great sugar-producing archipelago.

That is what the Secretary of War said to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and he knew what he was talking about and he meant what he said. Now, I cite these facts not by any means to question the good faith or absolute fairness of the gentleman from Connecticut or anyone else who has advanced that proposition, but simply to show the absolute worthlessness, for the purpose sought, of the figures they have cited to sustain their proposition.

However, I would prefer to leave it right where they left it, with 7,000,000 acres of arable land, and then admit more of their claims and say that there is only one-tenth of that amount adapted for cane sugar and only one-half of that, which can be cultivated in any one year. That will be 750,000 acres of adaptable land, and then dividing that figure by two, we will say that the amount that will be cultivated in any one year is 375,000 acres. The amount before dividing is about the admission of the remarkably fair, the remarkably candid, and remarkably disinterested (?) witness, Mr. Welborn, the head of the insular department of agriculture, who has sufficient interest in this problem to come 11,000 miles to see that it does not go awry. He admitted that in 1903 there were 180,000 acres under cultivation, and then in response to interrogation he said that that amount could be increased twofold, threefold, and fourfold, which would make 720,000 acres, nearly 750,000 acres. Now, I wish the questioner had gone a little slower and had not jumped to tenfold at once, which Mr. Welborn refused to admit, because I think further interesting disclosures would have been made if the examination had proceeded more cautiously; but we will let it stand at 750,000 acres.

Their next statement is that the possible production is only some 300,000 tons, and entirely too small to injure the American producer.

Now, this same Mr. Welborn says that the island of Negros produces eight-tenths of the crop, therefore that can be pretty fairly taken as a type of the islands for the purpose of sugar cultivation. The testimony at Iloilo, given by the Filipinos themselves, is pretty nearly unanimous that that land yields about one and three-tenths to one and a half tons of sugar per acre, and some witnesses put it higher. That, you may remember, is under conditions of cultivation and manufacture that the gentleman from New York so eloquently described, where two carabaos and one man work alternating shifts, vibrating between the mudhole and the sugar plantation, scratching the ground to the depth of 3 to 5 inches; where the land is unfertilized and where no modern machinery or methods are used. Making no allowances for any improvements in culture or extraction, that acreage at 1.3 tons per acre would yield 487,500 tons of sugar per annum.

There remains only the question of extraction. Now, we can not assume for one moment that the planter of Negros, be he Filipino or be he foreigner, will continue the same methods of operation after this bill goes into effect which obtain now. He will not go on using two carabaos to crush one stalk of cane. He will have new methods and new machinery, and the extraction will be about the ordinary normal extraction, where the ordinary result with reasonable facilities appears to be 90 per cent instead of 55 (which is the average of 50 per cent and 60 per cent which they admit now). Now, that extraction would result in about 800,000 tons instead of 487,500 tons, and I believe that this is a more than fair, more than moderate, and more than conservative estimate of the production of the Philippine Islands, both as to extraction and acreage, and this amount, which is more than two and a half times the 300,000 tons that that they allow would, with any such tariff differential as proposed, certainly drive large importations into this country.

One of the witnesses speaks of a probable million tons as the ultimate production of the islands, and earlier estimates were larger still. I call to your minds the fact that we are legislating not for 1903 or 1904, but, as the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has told us, for the generations to come, during which time, we are told, we are to hold these islands. The fact is, what we are really to expect is what has happened in every instance where production under tropical conditions has received the benefit of northern capital, energy, example, and governmental protection; the growth will be tremendous in both acreage and extraction, and we shall not have 375,000 acres but more than twice that amount, yielding not 800,000 tons but more than double that amount, with a million tons for export, all forced into the United States by means of the tariff differential.

Then they say that the price of Philippine sugar will be so high that it can not compete with our own.

The gentleman from New York very adroitly developed the proposition that the Philippine sugar reaches New York at a cost of $4.13 per hundred pounds. Now, I want to consider this statement a few moments. Mr. Welborn says the sugar of the islands at Iloilo sold in 1903 at $1.25 per hundred on the general market. Mr. Welborn, of course, disputes the conclusion and claims that the product was sold at a loss, but the selling price may be well taken as a maximum cost of production. This is pretty nearly elementary. That statement was in a measure confirmed by the hysterical telegram read in the Senate the other day, in which the selling price was put at $1.35. Again we have the statement of Mr. Luzuriaga, of the Philippine Commission, in the same Philippine census, who stated that they can, and for the last few years have produced Philippine sugar in the island of Negros for from $2.50 to $3.50 per picul Mexican, the average of which would be about $1.08 gold per hundredweight, so I think $1.25 gold is a very liberal estimate.

We will now take the figures of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] again, and we will add 25 or 30 cents for freight to New York and for insurance and transportation, which seems to me pretty high, and then we will add another dollar to this because of the fact that we pay that amount for refining it, and that makes a cost of refined sugar in New York of $2.55. Now, they have put on another absolutely arbitrary dollar; and there I decline to follow. They say that, because of the grade of Philippine sugar and because of the fact that for the last few years difficulties in production and extraction, due to bad methods and machinery, have resulted in an inferior product, making Philippine sugar worth a cent a pound less in New York than the standard grades, therefore we should add this sum to the cost.

Now, I submit that the gentlemen have no right, in discussing the conditions as they will exist after the tariff barriers have been removed and after profitable exploitation under improved methods has been made possible, to base their conclusions for the future upon facts as they exist to-day, with all the crudities and all the limitations that the gentlemen describe; and that there is no reason, in fact or in probability, why Philippine sugar should not and will not reach New York in as marketable a condition, well up to the general average, and in as high a grade of purity as unrefined sugar which comes from the island of Java or from Porto Rico or from the smaller importing countries.

I submit, therefore, that the 1 cent differential added because of the present poor condition of the Philippine product is not fairly or properly considered in estimating the future values of the Philippine output. Leaving this out of consideration, therefore, and adding the maximum tariff of 42 cents, which is 25 per cent of the Dingley rates at 96 per cent purity, the total value which can be ascribed to Philippine sugar on the New York markets is $2.97 per hundredweight. Add to this, if you will, 20 cents for freight rate from New York to Chicago, and the Philippine product meets the Rocky Mountain product at the markets in Chicago at the gross cost of $3.17 per hundredweight.

The Colorado sugar this year cost, sacked in the factory, without any allowance for loading or shipment, $3.71 per hundredweight. Add to that 27 cents for freight to Chicago, and the Philippine product of the little brown man meets the product of the American farmer with a differential in its favor of 81 cents per hundredweight.

And let me say here that in estimating the cost of the Colorado sugar there is considered and deducted, the value of the by-product and the amounts received from the sale of pulp. Even if we should allow 50 per cent of the lower prices due to present inferior quality and adjust the tariff proportionately, the difference in favor of the Philippine product would be nearly 0.4 cent per pound. That this reduction is abundant is shown by the fact that much of the time even now the difference between Mascavado, which is about the same as the Philippine product, and standard sugar in New York has been only 50 cents.

No one can believe for a moment, it seems to me, that the differential will be even so small, but that is enough to be prohibitive.

But our friends say that the Philippine product can not be a factor in the American markets because they say that the competitive price will be fixed by the volume of sugar which pays the full tariff duty; and that the Philippine sugar can not compete seriously with the American product until it has displaced importations paying the full duty. Now, I suppose that is a correct statement, and we may admit it, but what are the facts in regard to that? Why, they are simply this: We imported during the last year, in addition to the sugar coming from Hawaii and Porto Rico without tax, and Cuba with 80 per cent of the Dingley rate, about 650,000 tons of sugar which paid the full tariff rates, and that is the sugar that is going to fix the price of competitive sugar in our market. Well, what is going to become of that full-duty importation? Naturally, if there is a portion of the sugar that pays the highest tariff, that which pays no tariff is going to increase comparatively by leaps and bounds; that which pays a reduced rate will also increase, but less rapidly, and this increase will reduce relatively the amounts coming from the countries paying the full rates, and that is just what has happened. Porto Rican sugar since the tariff has been taken off has increased in production 180,000 tons, and the Cuban sugar has increased in the aggregate much more than that, and the Hawaiian has also increased phenomenally. The result inevitably must be that more and more the high-tariff importation is going to yield to the low-tariff importation, and the increase from Porto Rico and Hawaii will more and more meet and displace sugar coming from Java, the Straits Settlements, and the other full-tariff countries, which must relatively decline. More and more therefore, year by year, the domestic product will meet in the domestic markets the Philippine sugar with a differential of more than 25 per cent of its cost in favor of the latter.

They say the normal increase of consumption in this country takes care of the increase in the countries favored by tariff concessions. Well, again they are very much in error in the figures. The increased production since 1903 in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba was about 450,000 tons, by Willet & Grey's figures. All of the exports from these countries come to the United States, and the local consumption is only a negligible factor in their total crop which for 1905 was over 2,100,000 tons. The increase in the consumption in this country for the same time was only about 93,000 tons; and if you should go back one year further you will find it was still less; that it was only about 75,000 tons. In other words, the increase in domestic consumption, without any allowance for increase in domestic production, not only does not equal the increase in production in countries enjoying tariff advantages with this country, but is only a little over one-fourth of that increase; and what is true of Cuba, Hawaii, and Porto Rico will be equally true of the Philippines.

The conclusion is irresistible. You describe in glowing terms the degraded condition of the people, the crude and inefficient machinery, the untoward conditions under which the Philippine sugar planter labors; you teach him the possibilities of the business, and still argue that results will remain as they are with regard to the volume of his production and the seriousness of the menace resulting therefrom.

You admit that under almost impossible conditions he has reached a maximum of 280,000 tons annually. You propose to throw over him the ægis of American power and protection, to allow him to maintain his own tariff barriers against the rest of the world, and to support him therein; to practically remove the barriers between him and the most splendid market the world has ever seen; to afford him the mighty stimulus of American example; to give him the full benefit of American capital, enterprise, machinery, and methods, and you still figure the results in terms of carabao plow and Spanish misrule. If, under such conditions, he will raise 280,000 tons, what, in heaven's name, can he raise under the conditions you propose?

Never before has a northern government proposed to bring its own labor and its own industrial conditions in direct competition with tropical labor and tropical conditions, and, in addition thereto, protect the latter in the competition.

You say that the tropical planter will not avail himself of his opportunity and that tropical industry will progress at a snail's pace, and you figure twenty years as the period necessary for the development of the industry in the Philippines to a maximum even of 300,000 tons. The conclusion of all this, if true, is that you are not playing fairly with the Filipino; you are leading him to believe that he will reap some immediate benefit, but you tell us it will not harm us because it is too small a concession to injure, and therefore too small to help. On your own confession, your bill is an emasculated affair, which you protectionists, you Republicans, support, because there is not enough free trade in it to hurt, and you Democrats who accept it do so because there is not enough protection in it to hurt. [Applause.]

So far as the Filipino is concerned you—

> * * * palter with him in a double sense,
> And keep the word of promise to his ear,
> But break it to his hope.

The Filipino asks for bread and you give him a stone. Somewhere in the dim recesses of my memory there comes something from a Biblical source, and it runs something like this:

> I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot.

So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth.

That is what some of us would like to do with this Philippine bill. [Applause.] It is neither one thing nor another. It does not help the Filipino, and you say neither does it hurt the American. If you mean what you say, and of course you do, if you are genuine, and of course you are, why do you not do something that is substantial for the Filipino? Why do you not turn your energies to some other source where there will be no competition with an American industry? Why do you not develop his coffee plantations, that paid at one time $2,500,000 annually, and at one time was the fourth article of importance in export? Why do you not turn to the rubber industry?

Turn your attention to some other noncompetitive form of production. Again, if you are genuine, as I have no doubt you are, why do you not amend this bill so that it will accomplish every purpose? We who are desirous of protecting the sugar industry in this country are sincere in our statements when we say that it is not the 100,000 or the 200,000 tons of Philippine sugar that we fear, but it is the seven, eight, nine, and ten hundred thousand tons which is coming that will destroy our industry.

Why don't you amend your bill providing that 200,000 tons of Philippine sugar and a proportionate amount of tobacco be admitted absolutely free, and that thereafter imports shall pay the Dingley rates? That will give a substantial help to the Filipino, and that will give to the American producers the protection and assurance that they need.

If the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are sincere, and of course they are; and if they support this measure because it is a step in the right direction, and not because, in the language of the minority report, they hail with joy evidences of dissension in our ranks; and if they believe that the Philippine product will be inconsiderable, as they seem to, then they, too, should accept this suggestion, because it is a longer step in the right direction; and we then may have the edifying spectacle of the gentleman from Mississippi taking the arm of the gentleman from New York to take this longer step, and we will all fall in.

The records have not, however, sustained your views as to the probable increase. When the industry was first introduced in the Philippines, under conditions very similar to those which you now propose, stimulated by American and English capital, with easy access to American and English markets, the industry increased from 1855 to 1860 sixfold, or 600 per cent, and in the fifteen years from 1855 to 1870 it increased 2,000 per cent. Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba have increased in the last two years over four times as much as our domestic increase in consumption.

In Porto Rico, with a vastly higher labor wage cost, under the stimulus of a free trade with the United States, the increase from 1901 to 1905 has been about 180,000 tons, and its possibilities are by no means exhausted. You say that there will be no competition. I should like to cite you an instance.

A few hundred miles south of the archipelago lies Java. It is bathed by the same tropical seas. The sun and the shade, the wind and the rain have done for Java what they have done for Luzon, and no more, probably hardly as much. Java has a little larger area than Luzon, but no more arable land. It has been cursed with the most complicated system of land tenure the Dutch brain could invent. Every kind of misrule laid its heavy hand on the country for generations. It has only about 250,000 acres in sugar plantations, not the amount of available land in Mindoro and Cebu alone.

Under Dutch rule, without tariff advantages in its trade with this country, the production of sugar in 1890 was only 350,000 tons; under the stimulus occasioned by release of government control in the island in 1891, the withdrawal of bounties in Europe, and later by the diminution of the Cuban product, the Javanese increased their production, by 1896, to the tremendous total of 600,000 tons. In 1904 they had reached 950,000 tons, and in 1905 it exceeded a million tons, of which 450,000 tons was imported to this country, paying full tariff rates. In 1903 this export sugar, according to the most careful estimates that I can find, was produced in the island of Java at a cost of about 1 cent to 0.125 cent per pound, eliminating from the computation the sugar product on the smaller estates not for export. This is shown also by the fact that in 1903 the average selling price over the entire island, including therein domestic sugar made on the native plantations by obsolete and very expensive methods, was 1.71 cents per pound.

I am quite aware of the difference in labor conditions between the two islands, but these are apparent rather than real. The latest statistics obtainable from Java show an average wage of the whole island, on the sugar estates of 11 cents per day, and in this estimate there is again included the comparatively backward development on the interior lands, where labor is employed which is far below the average, and where, as I have stated before, the export sugar is not produced in large quantities. If one should confine himself, as he properly might, to the leased lands and the Government holdings, where the largest amount of the export sugar is grown, and where the class of labor is much better than elsewhere, there would be little, if any, difference between the Philippine figures and the Javanese.

And what Java has done, the Philippines certainly can do. The Dutch colonies have no advantage over our own, many conditions are not so favorable, and the artificial stimulants to Javanese production from legislative and governmental action, at home and abroad, do not compare with the benefits you propose to shower on these islands.

Right in this connection I wish to say one word with reference to the advance of the cost of labor in the Philippine Islands. When the Philippine census is favorable, it seems to be freely quoted; when not, there seems to be some disposition to rely upon that ever-present help in time of trouble, Mr. Welborn.

At page 487, Volume IV, of the Philippine census, the total number of laborers on sugar estates is given at 45,247, and the total monthly wage at 388,817 pesos, or an average rate of 17 cents gold per day. The latest authoritative statement from a governmental source is found in the report of the Department of Agriculture, under date of August 31, 1904, where this same rate is given as 16 cents per day gold, in money and food combined. And this is the class of labor which you propose to protect against, and bring into competition with the laborer in the mountain States who receives, in the beet fields, from $2 to $2.50 per day for the lowest grade of labor.

But I do not care whether in the Philippines the wage is 15, 16, 17, 18, or 19 cents per day; it is a miserably underpaid labor. And are you going to legislate with regard to it so that the American laborer in our beet fields, as he goes home at night and see the house his industry has built, his children to whom he has given the advantage of American citizenship, and the comforts that he has given them, must necessarily stop and think of his own condition. He will think that over on the other side of the globe the sun is just rising; that the American flag is floating there, and there is a fellow crawling out of his bamboo hut, without doors, without windows; who dresses himself in a waistcloth and gets his breakfast from the trees and his dinner out of the stream, and he is going to work in the Philippine sugar fields for 15 or 20 cents a day, and bring his work in competition with our man here at one-tenth of the sum per day which the American is paid. You are going to make that man think, too, that the Republican party is responsible for that competition, and, gentlemen, it will be pretty hard to convince him that he is wrong.

There is another phase of this subject to which I want to call your attention very briefly. We are Republicans on this side of the Chamber. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS] said yesterday, we are Republicans because we are protectionists, not protectionists because we are Republicans; and he stated it truly, because it is a matter of principle with us. And yet we are Republicans, and party men, and we believe in, and we glory in the Republican party, and we believe that it has, that it can, and that it will direct and govern this country better than any other party ever has, ever can, or ever will. [Applause on the Republican side.] And because we believe that, we have once and again appealed to the great backbone of our country for our tenure of party power, and once and again they have not said us nay. The men who made the Republican party and have kept it in power almost uninterruptedly for fifty years in this country, are the tillers of the soil. They are the men who made possible in the last twelve years a balance of trade in our favor of something like $5,000,000,000; who have not only done that, but who have, by the value of their product, wiped out an adverse balance against us of five hundred million dollars.

These men claim and should receive some measure of consideration. I admit, nay, I do not admit, but I claim and maintain and contend, that the farming industries share in the benefits of the protective policy in full measure with every other industry. I maintain and claim that the condition of the agricultural laborer advances as the condition of every other wage-earner advances. We all understand and contend that the condition of agriculture advances as general industrial conditions advance; that the farmer's markets have extended as the commerce of the nation has grown, and yet a concrete example is always better than an abstract illustration. We have talked protection to the farmers and we have talked to them about the tariff on wheat, and some Democratic brother has risen and called attention to the fact that we were the greatest wheat-exporting country on the globe. We have talked about the tariff on dairy products, as we had a right to, and we have been reminded that we are so far beyond competition, except on the Canadian border, that the tariff can have no direct tangible effect on the price of those products.

Then somebody has cited the fact that down in Argentina they buy the same kind of a reaper for $60 that the American farmer here pays $100 for. We have met those arguments legitimately, properly, strongly as we could, and rightly, and yet they have had their effect. Here is one case where the farmer does receive a direct, tangible, definite, absolute benefit. And can we, who have been pledged to the support of this industry by our platform utterances, by the declarations of our leaders, by the truths of our economic principles—can we gainsay it now? If we do, may not "weighed, wanting, divided," well be written on our standards?

I said before that, in the language quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, consistency was indeed "the terror of feeble minds," but that suggestion does not apply to parties. That is for individuals. Parties are based on economic principles, and economic truths do not change. They tell us it takes ten years to develop a Philippine sugar plantation. It takes more than ten years to change an economic truth. What was true in 1896 is true now (reading):

We—

condemn the present Democratic Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

That is from the Republican national platform of 1896. That was true then. It is true now. That is what we want to do, and that is what we will do, with God's help, if you will give us a chance. [Applause.]

Gentleman, the protective tariff is a unit. The protective system is one great structure. You can not attack one of its foundations without weakening it everywhere, and you can not assail it in one spot without opening it to attack in other spots. It must stand together, and it should, for the interests of this country are not diverse. The interests of Colorado and of Montana and of Wyoming and of Idaho are not inherently different from the interests of Pennsylvania and Ohio and New York and New England. Every principle of protection, every argument that we can possibly make in favor of any protected industry, applies with double force to beet sugar. It is new; it is intensifying; it stimulates every line of activity. The value of the output is represented by a labor element of not less than 80 per cent, and that labor is skilled, intelligent, progressive, and well paid. It is the labor of our own people, of our own brothers; they are our own citizens; they are working for the upbuilding of our own country, and they are asking at our hands protection against an alien race; labor paid almost as cheaply as any on the globe and favored by tropical conditions of food, clothing, and necessary expenditures.

I appreciate as thoroughly as anyone the force of a moral argument. I think an appeal to plain duty does not fall unheeded on my ears. I think I understand in some small degree what should be the generosity, the forbearance, and the breadth of outlook of a great nation, but to me the plain duty that I see arising, is my duty to those whose commission I hold, whose interests I in part represent; who are working along the same lines that I am trying to work, for the upbuilding of great and prosperous commonwealths; and the generosity which appeals to me is the degree of generosity we should show to the best class of immigrants who ever came to our shores, to the men of Sweden, of Denmark, of Belgium, of Germany, and the better class of Russians, the men who mingle with us and in an economic sense, become bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh; who become units in our industrial communities, factors in our civic life, and carry their full share of the burdens of citizenship.

The Rocky Mountains are far from the seaboard, but they are no farther than was the Ohio from the Philadelphia of Washington's day.

The founders of this Government stretched their gaze southward and westward. They saw great cities, thriving communities, and growing wealth where then there was only a wilderness. Our restless Saxon blood still carries in its channels their ideas, their hopes, and their aspirations; but they saw more, dreamed of more, worked for more, and accomplished more.

It was not only national prosperity they desired. They have builded a state upon a foundation of civic righteousness, consecrated to liberty, whose cornerstone is the individual, his rights, his future, his development, and his home.

They made this nation great, not only in its wealth and its military prowess, not only in its vast stretches of great States, but along the higher lines, in education, in art, in literature, in philanthropy, and in every feature of an enlightened Christian civilization.

Talk of duty! What duty have we more sacred than to carry on the work they initiated and remain faithful to the ideas and ideals they stood for; to carry into our newer States the standard of civilization and national life they raised on the frontier of their day?

Right? Is it not right to do this? Were they not right in the toil and self-sacrifice the fruits of which we now enjoy?

The people of Colorado and of the other mountain States are our own people. Out there we hark back through a hundred lines to other origins blending with your own. Now it is the green-clad Berkshires, now the valleys of New York, again the stretches of the sunny South that rise in our minds when we think of home. Again, it is the great reaches of the Central West which call to us with the love of our childhood days, but with it all, and because of it all, we are one people.

Saxon, Norman, and Dane we may be, but Americans all, in our devotion to our American ideas of home, of freedom, and of national unity and growth. In the name of that unity, in the name of our own people, of our past, of our present, and of our glorious future, we of the West ask that you should not put this cup to our lips; we plead with you that this unnecessary, ineffective, un-Republican, and unjust legislation shall not pass. For me, with all my strength, whatever it may be, in the name of duty, in the name of plain duty, if you will, and of the rights of these people and of all the people I shall vote and I shall work against this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, if this bill should pass this House, or a similar bill should pass Congress, then the tobacco farmer and the tobacco manufacturer in my State will look upon this legislation as another of the aftermath curses of acquiring the Philippine Islands by the United States Government. I tender my profound sympathy to the beet-sugar men in this House who arraign their party for breaking its pledges, but do not dare to go to the extent of denouncing it.

I desire to express my opinion, in a parliamentary way, I hope, about that great party and its attitude on this question. That it is a great party is unquestionably true. You can get the amplest testimony upon this side of the House to that fact when we have been overrun and overslaughed by it for nearly half a century. But, Mr. Chairman, there is something about this party that I arraign here to-day upon this legislation. I arraign it as a Democrat; I arraign it upon its long-continued policy and upon a departure from it, of the very foundation stone of it, which is its professed protection to American industries. And yet here is a bill that palpably repudiates that policy.

Eminent gentlemen upon the floor of this House, members of the Ways and Means Committee, to escape the charge of direct inconsistency within recent years in utterances, were driven to the expedient of saying, in effect: "Wise men change their opinions." The Republican party moves in a mysterious manner politically. It has adopted for its motto, for it is a worldly-wise body, and acts upon it: "Assume a virtue if you have it not." This party has inscribed upon its banners the words "God and morality," and it moves almost invincibly forward to its triumphs with the honest poor and the predatory rich fighting side by side. It is allied with the trusts and the corporate wealth of this country, and yet it despoils and exploits mankind in the name of humanity. If it covets its neighbor's land, this Republican party denounces "criminal aggression," and then, with flaming rifle and fixed bayonet, it moves into its neighbor's possessions and "benevolently assimilates" them. Eloquent gentlemen upon the other side of the House have arraigned their own party for breaking its pledges. Is not that arraignment true? I desire to read an extract from the campaign Republican text-book of 1900:

That duty [Porto Rican] was small, but it was an explicit declaration by the Republican party that it proposed to retain the power to fix such tariff as it might deem judicious against the product of cheap tropical labor wherever located and under whatever conditions. In other words, it was a distinct promise to the farmer that he need not fear that the Republican party would permit the cheap labor and cheap sugar of any tropical territory to be brought in in a manner that would destroy the infant industry of beet-sugar production which the farmers of the United States have, under the fostering care of the Republican party, been building up during the last few years.

Now, sir, I contend that that pledge was a pledge in principle, and that this Republican pledge went out to every infant industry that related to the farming industries of this country. I desire to arraign the Republican party for their broken pledge to the American tobacco farmer and tobacco manufacturer, the value of whose products will be lowered by competition with cheap oriental labor if this bill passes. More particularly I speak of the Florida tobacco farmer and the Florida tobacco manufacturer, whose interests are identical, so far as this bill is concerned. The Republican party is in supreme control of this Government. They are responsible for legislation. This bill is of Republican origin. They are responsible for its effect upon the American tobacco farmer and American tobacco manufacturer. It is unnecessary for me to discuss what the tobacco duty would be in amount were the Democrats in control of national legislation. It is sufficient to say that they are not in such control. The Republican party has built up largely by the McKinley and the Dingley tariff duties upon tobacco a prosperous and rapidly growing tobacco industry in the State of Florida. This is the testimony of tobacco planters and of the manufacturer. The tobacco farmer and the tobacco manufacturer are alike prosperous. Now, the political party that built up this tobacco industry proposes to throw it down. It proposes to reduce three-quarters at once the tariff duties upon Philippine tobacco, and in a few years to abolish the tariff duties entirely upon importations of tobacco from the Philippine Islands. And this is done upon two flimsy reasons; two impertinent reasons. First, that such removal will not injure the tobacco interests of this country; second, that the American people owe this legislative concession and benefit to the people of the Philippine Islands, whom the controlling Republican leadership are pleased to call the "wards of the nation."

It seems to me that I have heard those words used in past years by leading Republican statesmen in alluding to the negroes of the Southern States. Many of these negroes are now raising tobacco in the State of Florida upon lands owned by themselves. Some are getting good wages paid for their labor in the tobacco fields of others. Still others are engaged as laborers in tobacco factories in that State at profitable wages. Far back in the years gone by the Republican party promised to these negroes that long looked for but never possessed "40 acres and a mule." If the promise was not made by the party itself, still it was conveyed to these simple folk by that horde of Republican adventurers poured out from the North upon the Southern States, that robbed the white and black alike.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this question of testifying in the House by Members of this House as to the effect of this legislation and what they saw in the Philippine Islands is largely a matter of speculative, theoretical guessing of Congressmen upon the effect of proposed legislation upon industries. Opposed to these guesses and these speculations is the testimony of business men in the professions and businesses to be affected by this legislation. What is the testimony of Mr. G. W. Perkins, president of the Cigar Manufacturers' International Union? I am not vouching now for these statements. They are in the testimony, they are embodied in the record before the Ways and Means Committee, and I give them to you merely for what they are worth:

STATEMENT BY G. W. PERKINS.

The bill proposed to reduce the tariff on the cigars manufactured in the Philippine Islands and to have absolute free trade within four years from now is solely in the interest of the foreign corporations and the American Tobacco Company, which is largely controlled by the Standard Oil interests.

When W. C. Whitney, the ex-Secretary of the Navy, a Standard Oil man, died, he left to his estate between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 worth of stocks in the American Tobacco Company. About one-half of the cigar factories in the Philippine Islands are controlled by the Chinese manufacturers, and with the number of Chinamen (to be ascertained at Washington) now in the island will monopolize the cigar trade as they did prior to the exclusion act in San Francisco.

Prior to the passage of this Chinese-exclusion act in 1882 the cigar factories of San Francisco employed only 40 American citizens and over 6,500 Chinamen.

The bill proposed means that the Chinese-exclusion act, so far as it relates to the cigar industry, will be nullified completely by now reducing the tariff and ultimately establishing free trade.

Here is the statement of J. W. Upson, who represented the tobacco growers of the State of New York. What is the occasion of this legislation? Speaking for those he represents, he said:

They believe if this bill were to be introduced without the prestige of the Administration, without the insular government, without Secretary Taft putting the whip and spur, and the members of this outfit were to go on the floor, each and every man voting, you would not have enough votes to accomplish anything. That is what they wanted me to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think that is rather a low estimate of the House of Representatives?

Mr. UPSON. Well, it is an absolute fact. I do not believe there is a man in this house, or anywhere, that knows it any better than you do.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sorry that I can not agree with you.

Mr. UPSON. I believe you are one of the pattest tariff men naturally that there is around this board. You know this is only my guess.

I suppose he has a right to guess on this subject, as he has a very great interest in the matter.

I have a printed letter sent to me from Davenport, Iowa, of date December 30, 1905, addressed "To the honorable Members of the Fifty-ninth Congress," and signed "Cigar Makers' Local Union No. 172."

A paragraph from that letter reads as follows:

Gentlemen, if this bill successfully passes your honorable body, you are playing into the hands of the American Tobacco Company, who are the promoters and beneficiary of this bill.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] made the point that if the protected manufacturing interests of Pennsylvania and other great interests of the North and East were in danger from competition from the Philippine Islands, we would have no House bill No. 3. It does not require a Congressman to say that. It is evident to every intelligent mind in the country.

I desire to read an extract from the testimony of the statement of Mr. D. A. Shaw, of Quincy, Fla., before the Ways and Means Committee, representing the Florida Tobacco Company. He says:

It is argued that the Filipino operates in such a crude way that their development will be so slow as not to affect us. Suppose they had vast coal and iron fields there that would compete with us here, do you suppose for a moment that our coal barons and coal-road magnates would not consider their interests in great danger? No; they would marshal their brightest intellects and their untold millions to exclude this competition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do you think that they have not coal there?

Mr. SHAW. Then let coal and iron be put on the free list. Let steel rails be put on the free list. I am supposing a case. Coal and iron, of course, have to be contiguous to be profitable. Suppose the two were combined in one nice place like this at Birmingham.

The CHAIRMAN. Everything is put on the free list after 1909.

Mr. SHAW. I am showing that if they could export these things out of their country it would hurt the Americans. That is my supposition.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had people here talking about sugar, and we have had the tobacco men here, and now you are bringing in the iron and steel manufactures. Another dream.

Mr. SHAW. We think that we are wide awake. We may be doped to such an extent that we do not know whether we are awake or dreaming, but we think we are wide awake.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whose opinions on the floor of this House are worth the most, the speculative, guessing opinions of Members of this House or of men who for years and years have had their money employed in tobacco raising and tobacco manufacturing, and who in some cases have inherited through direct descent, for half a century or more, these tillable farms and these valuable manufacturing plants?

Here is a statement of Mr. Joseph H. Pierce, of Connecticut, before the Ways and Means Committee:

Mr. PIERCE. I am a tobacco raiser, and I have been one for fifty years, and have made my bread and butter that way. I have very little to say, but I want to say one thing, that I am totally opposed to any reduction of the duty on tobacco as it stands to-day. I have got that much to say, and I know it will be of great detriment to us if the duty is reduced.

Here is the testimony of Mr. Phelps, of Connecticut, before the Ways and Means Committee:

Now, I have been a grower of tobacco for the last sixty years or sixty-five years, and we have had jeopardies to conted with, and we do not want at this time any introduction of foreign wrappers to compete with us. It is as much as we can do to compete with the production of wrappers in our own country. We have to-day a large amount of money invested in buildings and tools and appurtenances for the growing and curing of tobacco, and we do not want the business to be menaced by a bill that will introduce any foreign wrappers at a less rate than under the Dingley bill of $1.85.

I most heartily agree with all that my friend Mr. Upson has said. He is a coworker with us in the Connecticut Valley. We know him from away back—truthful, honest, and well-meaning from beginning to end.

I do not wish to engage your attention for any length of time. I wish to be very brief, and in being brief I wish to report again that our people are unqualifiedly opposed to any reduction of the Dingley bill.

But I say those wrappers, in spite of the 46½ cents duty, would come here in competition with our wrappers. What is the reason those wrappers would not come here? I say they would.

Mr. Chairman, it is the testimony of business men, not the testimony of guessing, speculating Members in this House, as to what their opinions would be upon the growers and tobacco manufacturers of this country if this duty is reduced in part or altogether in the States for a few years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what has been the history of tobacco manufacturers in this country under this protective policy? I will read a short statement from Mr. Walter A. Schiffer's testimony before the Ways and Means Committee. He represents the united cigar manufacturers of New York City. He says:

The cigar-manufacturing industry of this country has been built up to its present magnitude mainly through the protective tariff that has been in operation since the close of the civil war. To absolutely prove this assertion I beg to refer you to the statistics of the internal-revenue department. Previous to the year 1864 there were manufactured in this country less than 200,000,000 cigars per annum. Within the next ten years the industry increased to 1,779,000,000. In each decade the trade under a protective tariff has increased as follows:

1900	5,963,000,000

During the fiscal year 1905 the cigar-manufacturing trade of the United States produced 7,589,337,206 cigars, paying the Government $20,976,091.95 internal-revenue tax and $20,482,809.99 import duties on tobaccos.

And it suggests itself to me that an industry which pays this Government such a large amount of money should be seriously considered before taking any action that would affect its interest.

This wonderful development has been possible for the reason that our industry has been directly fostered by a protective tariff.

I desire to read also a paragraph from the statement of Mr. J. L. McFarlin, of Quincy, Fla. He is largely interested in tobacco culture in Gadsden County, of that State. He is a man of fine general information, and his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee is entitled to much consideration. He says:

In Florida there are in four counties more than $10,000,000 invested in the culture of tobacco, giving employment, including those who are engaged in it, to no less than 100,000 people. The annual production from this State alone is over 4,000,000 pounds, and the value is more than $1,000,000. This industry is now in its infancy, for I am speaking more particularly of what you might term an "artificial" tobacco, or that grown under cloth or slats. For years the people of Florida in these counties have experimented and battled, with success, to grow a tobacco that would compete with Sumatra, and just as it has passed the experimental stage, and as they can now see the dawn of success, to have this industry crippled and perhaps totally destroyed by legislation and for the benefit, not of our equal or our fellow-man, but for a lower class of cheap and worthless mongrel labor, seems to me an injustice.

If given the same protection that we have enjoyed in the past in a few years these three States that I have mentioned above will produce enough tobacco of the finer grades, comparing with the Sumatra, to supply the United States. This will mean the taking place of 37,000 bales of Sumatra annually imported and valued at more than $6,000,000.

So I might read, Mr. Chairman, the views of others. Coming to this practical point, I wish to direct your attention to the development of that industry in Florida. In 1894 the people of that State raised but one-half acre of shade-grown tobacco. The past year they had the large area of 3,000 acres grown in the shade and a product of more than 12,000 bales. All this goes to show, Mr. Chairman, that the tobacco industry of this country has grown and prospered under a high protective tariff.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the results of all this protection are to be jeopardized, if these experts who grow this tobacco and manufacture it are to be believed and are thought to be sincere. Then the industries on the farm and in the shop are to be ruined if this bill gives such opportunity of free competition to the importation of foreign-grown products. I decline to treat the Philippines, as a Democrat on the floor of this House, other than as my party says, as political outsiders. They are here in the body of this Government as a mere political asset. If the Democrats to-day had possession of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives and the Presidency, and were true to their platform utterances, they would part with these islands, and wish them godspeed, with a reservation possibly of enough land for a naval base and coal-supply station for this country. Therefore, if that is the attitude of the Democratic party, why, as American citizens, should we throw down the barriers which the Republican party has erected heretofore between foreign tobacco products and those of the United States?

It will be time enough when the Democratic party wins a battle in this country sufficient to control its Presidency and the two Houses of Congress to discuss what this industry in my State shall suffer by way of reduction of tariff duties under what we call the Democratic doctrine of a tariff limited to the raising of revenue. That question is not before this House at this time. I take the Republican party upon its own declarations, upon its pledges to the people of the United States, that they would protect this industry if they would go into it. That brings me to the point that many of the Republicans of this body—those who have lately visited the Philippine Islands—have made. It is idle for them to say that that country is not fertile and that the labor there is in such a condition that it will never compete with this country. Who is able to say that the output in sugar cane and tobacco in those islands, under the influence of capital, with improved methods and better cultivation, can not successfully compete with and break down the American raised and manufactured products?

Now, the very same gentlemen, Members of this body, who visited these islands in the last year, have testified on the floor of this House; and I know of nothing more amusing than to witness such amateur expressions of opinion in opposition to the testimony of those familiar by experience with the subject, and in opposition also to the testimony of Government experts. It may be very ingenuous, but yet it is not very interesting to those whose industries will be adversely affected by this legislation. Mr. Chairman, there is no better judge of the fertility of the Philippine Islands and their adaptation to raising tobacco and their capacity to raise it than the Government experts sent to that country. They are presumably sent there by this Government because of their technical knowledge—their expert knowledge—and it is idle for Members of this House to interpose their jests and their jokes about the virtue or excellence of Philippine cigars against the testimony of these Government experts. Here is a pamphlet sent out, marked "Farmers' Bulletin No. 5," upon the cultivation of tobacco, by Clarence W. Dorsey, soil physicist, in charge of soil investigations, and dated Manila, P. I., April 22, 1903. He was sent there by this Government. I have here his letter transmitting his report to the Bureau of Agriculture. In that letter occurs this language, in writing about tobacco:

The cultivation of this profitable crop deserves more widespread attention, for the soil and climatic conditions in many parts of the Philippines are favorable for growing tobacco that can successfully compete with the finest grades produced in the world.

Again he says in his report:

Philippine tobacco has long been held in high esteem in the Orient, and Manila cigars maintain the same rank in Eastern countries that Habana cigars occupy in Europe and America. To-day tobacco stands third among the exports from the Philippines.

And again here is his language:

The markets of the United States offer every inducement for the improvement and spread of the Philippine tobacco industry. This becomes all the more evident when we consider the vast sums of money annually expended by the United States for foreign tobacco. During the year ending June 30, 1900, the United States, according to official statistics of the agricultural imports of the United States, paid for Cuban tobacco $7,615,991 United States currency and $4,569,271 United States currency for Sumatra tobacco. During the same year the Philippines exported to the United States only a few hundred dollars' worth of tobacco, or less than one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the tobacco importations of that country.

Now listen. This testimony in Mr. Dorsey's report has much significance to the American tobacco raiser and manufacturer:

While it may be true that Philippine tobacco may never entirely supplant Cuban and Sumatra tobacco in the United States, there is certainly every inducement to encourage and improve the industry until modern cultural methods have realized to the fullest extent the highest perfection of the crop.

Now, in conclusion, this Government expert (not an amateur Congressional witness), whose opinion is valuable from the simple fact that he knows what he is talking about, concludes his report with this language:

The author is of the opinion that the Philippine Islands can and should produce cigar-filler tobacco that is fully equal to the finest product of the famous Vuelta Abajo district in Cuba and a cigar wrapper equal to Sumatra tobacco. With careful attention to soil and climatic conditions, it is believed districts can be found that will raise tobacco similar in flavor and aroma to that grown in the best districts of Turkey. These results can only be obtained, however, by persistent, intelligent, well-directed efforts on the part of the planters.

Now, Mr. Chairman, within the past ten years this tobacco industry—tobacco grown under shade, the Sumatra tobacco—in the State of Florida was in its most crude condition. The tobacco farmers labored under this disadvantage—the want of improved up-to-date cultural methods. But home capital and capital from the North and from the West have invested in my State, and the consequence is that in a statement issued last year the Department of Agriculture of this Government made this declaration:

Florida tobacco growers have experimented with methods of shading, cultivating, fertilizing, harvesting, and handling cigar tobacco and have developed an industry of vast importance. To-day they are producing the highest class tobacco grown in the United States, employing methods they have originated and put into actual practice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, partly under the stimulus of the McKinley protection and the stimulus of the Dingley rates, under Republican protection, my State has built up an industry which the Department of Agriculture calls one of vast importance. And yet you Republicans, taking your own Government expert's testimony as correct, propose to do that which your party leaders said a few years ago you would not do, namely, to put twelve millions of Malays in competition with the American tobacco grower and the American manufacturer.

I do not believe that the tobacco farmer in my State or in any other State in this Union believes that the Filipino himself could produce that tobacco in the next five years that would sacrifice his interests. But they know very well that with soil and climatic conditions favorable, with the cheap labor there, money from the United States and from foreign states will enter that fruitful and fertile country, and there manufacture the raw article which, imported into this country free of duty, will strike down these Florida industries and these interests throughout the United States, built up under the McKinley and Dingley rates—a policy against which I enter my protest, and I do it as a Democrat. I do it without in any way committing myself to the policy of protection. I impeach the sincerity of the Republican party which makes a pledge to the American tobacco farmer and the American tobacco manufacturer and then deliberately breaks it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LAMAR. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does the gentleman doubt that the Philippine Islands now constitute part of the United States?

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, I decline to go into any constitutional or technical discussion with reference to those islands, their occupancy, control, possession, or ownership by this Government. It is sufficient for me to say to you, my distinguished friend from Kentucky, and every other Democrat on the floor of this House, that if you had the power to-morrow you would say to them "Go in peace," for that is the practical effect of your political attitude; it is mine, it is Mr. Bryan's, it is the platform declaration of the Democratic party, and I decline as a practical question on the floor of this House to sacrifice the interests of the people of Florida on this bill because the Republican party desires to break its pledges to the tobacco grower and manufacturer.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But will not the gentleman concede that if the Philippine Islands constitute a part of the United States, then it is not within the authority of Congress to impose a tariff against the import of their product to the United States proper?

Mr. LAMAR. I am willing my friend shall entertain what opinions he pleases about the islands and their relation to this Government. I have expressed mine. Whenever the Democratic party gets into power—if it ever does get into power—and gets the President and the Senate and the House, then when this proposition to make a tariff bill, whether a duplicate of the Wilson bill or a better bill, comes up, and it is proposed to cut down protected industries, then it will be time enough for the tobacco growers and manufacturers in Florida to appear before that committee and say what will be such a reduction, if any, of the McKinley or Dingley rate as will put them on a fair footing with other industries in this country. I am taking it as a practical question now, and am addressing my remarks to the House from a Democratic standpoint, and arraigning the Republican party for withdrawing the protection to the people of Florida which they have guaranteed. They have permitted an industry to be built up partly under the shelter of the McKinley and Dingley bills, and now they propose to withdraw that protection, to withdraw the shield, and allow the Philippine Islands, with their fertile soil, with their own cheap labor, with American and foreign capital training and directing it, to produce a raw product of the finest tobacco and ship it in here and break down the industries that have grown up in the State of Florida largely under a Republican tariff bill. I protest against it and will vote against it. I am addressing my remarks to the Republicans of this body.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me a question? I know he is thoroughly familiar with tobacco growing.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. LAMAR. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why has not that splendid tobacco come into the United States during the past three years when it has had a preference of $170 a ton?

Mr. LAMAR. I will say to the gentleman frankly——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman recognizes that it has had a 25 per cent preference over any other tobacco?

Mr. LAMAR. I will say frankly that, reading the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, I believe that the tobacco industry in the Philippine Islands has declined in the last few years. Why? When the Spanish masters had them by the neck they made them work; they demanded a better material.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman expect that the American people are going to do the same thing that the Spanish masters did—take them by the neck and make them work?

Mr. LAMAR. They won't be the Spanish masters in the same way or in the same sense, but wherever and whenever the American Tobacco Company, with its capital and other American and foreign capital besides, puts its money into the Philippine Islands, buys these fertile lands, and works, trains, and makes experts of its cheap labor, then they will be the complete masters of the Philippine Islands and of the American market as the steel-protected industry here to-day is master of the American market, and that to such an extent that you can buy articles manufactured by them cheaper abroad than you can buy them in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. LAMAR. I will conclude, Mr. Chairman, in five minutes, if there is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks five minutes. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAMAR. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the reduction upon importation of tobacco from Porto Rico and the effect on the tobacco trade in this country from that small and unfertile isle, here is the testimony of Mr. Perkins before the Ways and Means Committee, as to cigars imported from Porto Rico. He is the president of the Cigar Makers' International Union. He says:

> Of the cigars imported from Porto Rico, which competition is now felt severely and will be felt much stronger during periods of trade depression, the American cigar trust controls over 40 per cent.

It runs through all this testimony, like a scarlet thread, that the American Tobacco Company—the American tobacco trust—and the Standard Oil interests are the real interests to be benefited in the Philippine Islands and in the American market.

It will not help the Filipino people directly. They will be merely an adjunct to this foreign and domestic capital in their own country, competing against the Florida tobacco grower and the Florida tobacco manufacturer, and against the American tobacco farmer and manufacturer everywhere. That is why the Florida farmer protests and the Florida manufacturer protests, and that is why the tobacco interests all over this country, with but few exceptions, protest against the passage of this bill. This bill from our standpoint is not a bill to help the Filipinos. It is a bill to exploit and despoil the Filipinos. It is a bill that substitutes in lieu of Spanish rule American and foreign money rule—that money rule which seeks to exploit that fertile isle; which seeks to take its fertile soil that needs no fertilizer, and with its cheap labor added, to overwhelm the American tobacco farmer and the American tobacco manufacturer. That is why I protest on the floor of this House as a Democrat against the passage of this Republican measure. It is a breach of the faith that the Republican party entered into with the tobacco raisers of Florida and the tobacco people of every other State when they shielded those infant industries a few years ago with almost prohibitive tariff duties—industries in the State of Florida declared by the Agricultural Department to be already of vast importance. Just as they are getting upon their feet and prospering you Republicans propose to knock their supports from under them. It is that, Mr. Chairman, to which I object, and I rest my objection just upon that point. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Chairman, the prolonged discussion on the bill now before the House has already brought out a great deal of valuable information on the subject of cane and beet sugar and tobacco, both here at home and in the Philippines. I might correctly say that the ground has been completely covered by those who have spoken here, whether for or against the measure. I desire, however, to briefly state the reasons that impel me to oppose this bill.

It is with considerable regret that I find myself in this position of opposition. I am particularly distressed by the knowledge that my views on the subject at issue are at variance with those of the leaders of my party on this question. I do not forget that the veteran members of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means who have reported this bill occupy a place, a very important place, in the galaxy of leaders of the great Republican party. Some of them for almost a generation have been leaders in that grand party and as such have ably done their part in proclaiming and championing the doctrine of protection to American labor and industries. Their speeches and expositions of political principles have crystallized into party declarations and have formed the text-books for handing down the traditions and teaching the principles of Republicanism.

I had my training in the school of Republicanism and my text-books were the teachings of these leaders, and because of this training I am convinced that my opposition to this measure is amply justified.

Having the honor to represent here on this floor a State in which beet sugar is produced in large quantities, I shall devote myself entirely to a consideration of the effects of the present measure on this particular industry, leaving to others better posted regarding cane sugar and tobacco the task of detailing the consequences to them.

I sincerely believe that this present measure is a serious menace to the beet-sugar industry of the United States. Without doubt it will check and retard its further development and threaten its very existence.

The origin of the beet-sugar industry in the United States is directly traceable to the protective policy that has long characterized our Government under Republican administration. That patriot and statesman, the beloved William McKinley, as chairman, in his time, of the Ways and Means Committee of this House, reported the wise tariff measure that ever afterwards bore his name. This measure provided for a governmental bounty of 2 cents on every pound of beet sugar raised within our borders. Under the stimulus of this bounty and the confidence inspired by it the first six beet-sugar factories in the United States were established, and thus was inaugurated an industry which has since grown to wonderfully encouraging proportions.

But this wonderfully encouraging growth did not go on uninterruptedly or without hindrance. Just as the stimulus of the McKinley bill had begun to be felt in the erection of beet-sugar factories the American people, allured by the siren voice of the free-trade party masquerading as tariff reformers, intrusted to that party the control of the Government, with the result that the withering blight of its administration fell upon the country during the years from 1892 to 1896. The beet-sugar industry, like all others, was seriously affected and passed through an exceedingly critical period of its existence. During these distressing years no new factories were projected or erected, as the following figures will show:

[Quantities in tons of 2,240 pounds.]

Year.	Factories in operation.	Sugar produced.
1892	6	12,018
1893	6	19,550
1894	5	20,092
1895	6	29,220
1896	7	37,536
1897	9	40,399
1898	15	32,471
1899	31	72,944
1900	34	76,859
1901	39	163,126
1902	44	195,463
1903[a]	53	208,135
1904	51	209,000

But after this severe object lesson, with a return to sanity of those who had gone astray and with the Republican party once more at the helm, confidence was again restored, the Dingley bill was speedily enacted, and the wheels of industry began to hum as they had never hummed before. It is only since the beginning of this last era of confidence and prosperity that the beet-sugar industry has really had a fair chance to grow and develop and show its possibilities.

It is interesting to note in this connection that when the Dingley bill was under consideration in the House the schedules were vehemently assailed by the Democratic minority, but their attacks were as vigorously met by the gentleman from New York, the able chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, as well as others. On that occasion he said:

> Now, we went at the sugar question with the idea in view to put sufficient duty to give us enough revenue and at the same time to enable us to raise sugar in this country. We want to build up the sugar industry in the United States.

Again, during that discussion, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in the course of an eloquent speech upon the doctrine of protection—and I will say his speeches are always able and convincing—expressed himself as follows:

> We will give to the sugar producer of Louisiana an opportunity to enlarge its products and to turn over some of the splendid lands of that beautiful State to the production of sugar instead of corn, cotton, and other products of the soil; and so, Mr. Chairman, throughout Nebraska, through Kansas, and all of the States of the Union the Republican party comes and offers this boon. We will protect the industries of the country in all directions from further demoralization, and we ask you to turn aside hundreds of thousands of acres of the splendid lands of all of these States from the production of corn, oats, wheat, potatoes and cotton, to put into an already over-stocked market, to the production of sugar, and give to the farmers upon farming lands of the country a better market with less competition than they now have.

These are some of the characteristic expressions of the leaders of the Republican party at that time, and clearly indicate their attitude and determination to foster and protect the beet-sugar industry.

I mention here, and take great pride in the fact, that my own State was in the forefront of this movement and has the distinction of building the first factory to be equipped entirely with American-made machinery.

We have now five factories in operation, with an annual capacity of about 50,000 tons of sugar and a capital of about $8,000,000. We are not only supplying our home requirements, but export about three-fourths of our production to other parts as far east as the Missouri River. [Applause.]

No industry in our country ever responded more promptly to or more completely justified the wisdom of the policy of protection than did the beet-sugar industry. [Applause.] With rare exceptions, wherever it has been undertaken in the United States it has proved eminently successful. So that the production of sugar has so greatly increased in the short space of five years that about 50 per cent of the total sugar output of this whole country, leaving out our insular possessions, is now credited to sugar beets. This fact alone demonstrates conclusively that beet-sugar production in this country is a commercial success, a success which, in my opinion, will be entirely overcome if this bill becomes a law.

Three million acres out of a total of half a billion acres of improved land in the United States, or 1 acre out of every 170 of our improved lands, if devoted to sugar would supply all our home needs; not only would it do this, but the withdrawal of such an acreage from the production of the ordinary farm crops would tend to improve the market for other crops by removing that surplus of production over actual needs which the farmer now has to contend with.

I have shown that from 1897 up to 1902 no cloud was on the horizon to darken the seemingly bright future of this new and vigorous infant industry; to all appearances it had become the settled policy of the Republican party to hasten the time when our country should produce a large portion, if not all, that it consumed of sugar, and the hope was that such a time would speedily arrive. The national irrigation law was everywhere hailed, not only as a means of creating homes for the homeless, but also as vastly enlarging the possibilities and hastening the development of the beet-sugar industry. The whole course of legislation denoted on the part of the Republican party a pride and satisfaction in its success and a guaranty for the future.

I feel confident that the production of beet sugar in this country would have been vastly greater even than it is to-day if the question of Cuban reciprocity and free trade with the Philippines had never been agitated; but since both these propositions have been brought forward and supported by hitherto champions of protection confidence in the future of this industry has yielded to uncertainty and is now giving place to anxiety.

It would be difficult to estimate the many benefits which have resulted to the agricultural communities where these factories have been built. Not only is the farmer who raises a crop of sugar beets assured of a ready cash market for his crop, which is one that does not enter into competition with other products of the farm, but also does it enhance the value of his land and induces him to adopt more scientific methods in his agriculture and adds to the diversity of his crops. Further than this, it gives an impetus to every branch of business, which is reflected throughout the entire community. [Applause.]

A majority of the majority of the able members of the committee who reported this bill have, I believe, recommended its passage. They profess to believe, and undoubtedly do believe, that the development of the cane-sugar industry in the Philippines which will follow the removal of the present tariff does not portend any injury to the competing beet-sugar industry of our country.

The arguments of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] along the line of sustaining their position singularly harmonize with those of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] against all forms of protection. [Applause.]

The position of the minority, however, in the light of past history, is much more consistent, for they are free traders by tradition and principle. They would go much farther, even to the extent of greatly reducing the tariff on coal, iron, steel, glass, and other important manufactures, so that the industries engaged in the production of these things would be exposed to world competition, regardless of the disastrous effects of such action. The interests affected by this proposed legislation have never for a moment counted on any assistance or special consideration from the free-trade minority, but have in perfect good faith, I maintain, counted on the necessary protection from the majority. If there ever has been one principle more than another of the Republican party that was basic and fundamental, it is that of protection—that principle which says that the higher level of the intelligent and well-paid labor of America must be maintained and guarded against the lower level of industrial Europe, and particularly the swarming millions in the Orient. [Applause.] On the other hand, the Democratic party from time immemorial has taken the opposite view.

It has been the persistent argument of the tariff reformer and free trader that the American laborer by reason of his superior intelligence and greater efficiency can successfully compete with the labor of the whole world. But this plausible argument of our free-trade friends has been vigorously and successfully met and disproved, as, of course, it could not prevail against the cold logic of facts.

The pending measure leads, however, to a reversal of the hitherto uniform course of legislation on this subject; it involves a departure from that principle of government which has done so much for the industrial developement of our country that its commerce is now become the wonder of the nations. It means that the farmer engaged in the growing of sugar beets will have now to compete with the cheapest labor and lowest level of living on the globe. One can not forbear the question, What becomes of the promises made by leaders in this House, in party platforms, and in public messages?

Why are we so concerned and gravely apprehensive as to the consequences of this proposed legislation? I will tell you. The situation that confronts us is the certainty that the inducements of low-priced productive lands and an abundance of cheap oriental labor in addition to the bounty amounting to about $1.40 per hundredweight will so stimulate the production of sugar in the Philippines that it, entering our ports, will precipitate a contest with our own sugar, with the results that our markets will be totally demoralized and the beet-sugar industry finally wiped out. A crushing blow will thus be dealt to the intelligent American farmer, for this industry has benefited him directly and indirectly more than any other.

In the extended hearings that have been held apropos of this measure the Committee on Ways and Means have listened to a great mass of conflicting testimony and argument. Some things, however, have been established beyond controversy. It appears that the total area of the Philippine Islands is 73,000,000 acres; that about 50,000,000 acres of this is forest land, leaving of arable coast and uplands about 23,000,000 acres. Approximately 30 per cent of the latter, some 7,000,000 acres, is now in private ownership, leaving 16,000,000 acres to be disposed of in tracts of 2,500 acres for sugar production. But there are vast areas of public lands much easier of reclamation than our western sagebrush prairies which can be converted into excellent and profitable cane plantations.

Now, let us consider for a moment the results of this policy in the light of past experience. Since 1875 we have had free trade with Hawaii. What has been the result? In 1875 Hawaii produced 11,197 tons of sugar. Under the stimulus of free access to our markets she now produces from 350,000 to 400,000 tons upon an area of only 100,000 acres, which is merely one one hundred and sixtieth part of the arable public lands in the Philippines adapted to sugar. Cuba, since obtaining a preferential of 34 cents per hundredweight, has doubled her production of sugar. Porto Rico has done likewise. Now, what is to hinder a vast increase of production in the Philippines? It is generally conceded that the natural conditions are ideal—soil, climate, and so forth—and that with up-to-date methods and machinery the industry will be enormously profitable. Where great profits are in sight the history of the world is that difficulties melt away and all obstacles are overcome. [Applause.]

Again, Japan, exultant over her success in her recent contest, is ready to begin a struggle for commercial laurels. On the Pacific coast are already heard mutterings of anxiety over the influx of Japanese to this country. Here is an opportunity for them to go to the Philippines, right at their doors, as it were, and reap the rich harvest resulting from free trade with the United States, the best market that the world affords.

Sugar cane is raised by Philippine labor at from 17 to 20 cents per day, while American farm labor ranges from $1 to $2 per day. The present tariff rate on sugar from the islands is $1.26 per hundredweight for 96° sugar, with a proportionate decrease for every degree of less purity. This bill proposes to take off all but 25 per cent of this duty, which will give importers of Philippine raw sugar a further reduction of about $12.60 per ton, or 63 cents per hundredweight, on all sugar brought from the islands to the States until 1909, and then absolute free trade. With a restoration to normal conditions and modern methods it is impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the extent to which production of sugar will increase.

The adoption of the policy embodied in this measure means, in effect, that we insure the Philippine producers of sugar against every other country a bounty to the extent of $1.68½ per hundredweight for every hundredweight they raise of 96° purity, and against Cuba's production to the extent of $1.32 per hundredweight. In other words, the policy is one of fostering and encouraging by a most liberal bounty the cane-sugar industry in the Tropics into competition with our own beet-sugar industry, a policy wholly unique and contrary to that of every other beet-sugar country in the world.

Now, it is claimed by some of the advocates of this measure that while it is intended to and undoubtedly will stimulate the production and raise the price of sugar in the Philippines, our home industry need have no fear of injury to its own markets thereby; that the mere potentiality of free entrance to our ports will enable the Philippine producer to control the oriental markets of China and Japan to the extent of obtaining for his product the United States price, less transportation and insurance charges, without this free entrance ever becoming actual. At the same time it is frankly admitted by the advocates of this bill that they expect to export to the United States vast quantities of sugar. This argument is so palpably absurd and fallacious that a moment's investigation will make it plain. The buyers of China and Japan will buy according to their needs in the world's markets. If sugar is quoted higher at Iloilo than at Java or elsewhere, then Iloilo need not expect to sell. The mere potentiality of free entrance of Philippine sugar to our ports will not raise the price of sugar produced in other countries to any appreciable extent, and the result will be that the entire Philippine product above that consumed at home will be disposed of in this country, and our own market will be depressed to an extent dependent upon the total Philippine production. It has required a hundred years of protection to develop the beet-sugar industry in Europe to its present state of perfection. It is now firmly established, as the following figures on European production will show:

Total beet-sugar production.

It has required time and experience to establish this beet-sugar industry in these countries; no European nation has thought to risk the fate of this beneficent industry to unrestricted competition with the cane sugar of the Tropics. Holland, though possessing Java and the Dutch East Indies, imposes the same duty on sugar from her tropical possessions as from other parts of the world; and in spite of this Java produces 1,000,000 tons of sugar annually to add to the world's supply.

Why can not the people in the Philippines be taught the same lesson of self-reliance instead of being coaxed and pampered in the most unwise and unreasonable way and to the menace and injury of our sugar industry here at home? [Applause.] This policy of unrestricted competition in the production of similar products between an alien oriental race and our own people in the end is bound to produce an intense racial antagonism.

The Philippines came into our possession through the fortunes of war, and until this present time we have been legislating for their immediate welfare and future good. We have assumed the responsibility of guiding them to a higher plane of civilization. They have been a very unfortunate people in the past, but we have given them a system of education, as also the widest opportunity to develop the resources of their country. We have sent them men of high character and great ability—men who are singularly devoted to their interests. No greater proof of this devotion can be cited than the effective intercession of these same men on behalf of the islanders for the legislation embodied in this bill. With such a body of men as has been sent them there—conscientious, powerful, intelligent, and able—with all that goes with experience and wisdom, more has been accomplished and is being accomplished than under any other colonial government in the history of the world.

The honorable Secretary of War, with other powerful allies, has seen fit to enlist himself in the cause of the Filipinos; in the present matter he has brought to bear in favor of this measure his strong personality and forceful ability.

The important duties which he has been called on to perform in connection with the pacification and rehabilitation of the islands has naturally awakened within him a sympathetic interest on account of the unfortunate condition of the inhabitants. But in the consideration of this matter he has approached it from the standpoint of the benefits accruing to the isalnds, while, in my view, the interests of American citizens is the paramount consideration. [Applause.]

It is contended by the advocates of this measure that the sugar and tobacco industries are at present in a languishing condition, while the other industries are doing well. But this is easily accounted for in the light of the successive calamities that have swept over the country, for which we are no wise responsible. The serious consequences of the insurrection were not overcome before an epidemic of "rinderpest" decimated their carabao; then followed successively and devastatingly surra, drought, typhoons, and ladronism, all combining to bring about the unfortunate conditions in these industries now prevailing there. But with the dawn of a brighter day and with an orderly administration affording protection to life and property we will soon be better able to determine what are the normal industrial conditions and capabilities of the island people. Time is the only thing seemingly now needed to a proper working out of their destiny.

In New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, for instance, this industry has not yet been established or tried to any great extent; but the products of the mills and factories of those States—the manufactures of iron and steel, glass and textiles, and all the varied manufactures of those great States are all wisely protected against the cheaper similar products of other countries. In the equipment and construction of our beet-sugar factories we patronize the mills and tool works of the East, all of whose product is protected, while it is here proposed to let this promising industry of ours shift for itself. In other words, the proposed bill discriminates against a new and struggling industry by lowering the tariff which protects it against the Philippines and the sugar trust, but "stands pat" on industries which, by all logical reasoning, are infinitely better able to meet the competition of the world.

This bill is in the interest of, not the natives, the real owners of the islands and the ones entitled to our sympathy, but speculators, exploiters, and capitalists, who alone will profit by it, while the beet-sugar men suffer a corresponding loss, if indeed their industry be not entirely wiped out.

If Pennsylvania or Ohio, and other manufacturing States, for example, were situated as are the beet-sugar sections, I feel certain that not one of their Representatives would have any hesitation in voting to maintain the protection vital to their material welfare. Can not we then confidently and with perfect propriety appeal to the Representatives of these powerful States, which have been the greatest beneficiaries of the principle of protection, to unite with us against this legislation which veils a menace and possible destruction to the beet-sugar industry? Can they expect to escape unscathed when the very fundamental principle which upholds their industries is ruthlessly set aside? If the agriculturist can successfully compete with an alien race in a state of semicivilization, what excuse can be offered for maintaining the tariff wall around those industries which involve a competition with the generously, by comparison, paid labor of Europe?

The legislation now before us for consideration and action defines a policy with respect to these islands that has the elements of permanency; it is not for one, two, or three years only, but for a generation. The future development of the Philippine Islands can not now be foretold. Fifty years ago our domain west of the Missouri was accounted of but little value by great statesmen of that day.

No person, I believe, now opposing this legislation anticipates any phenomenally rapid development of the sugar industry in the Philippines, but there is no escaping the conclusion that in the future, whether immediate or remote, the producers in the United States will have to meet a competition such as no other beet-sugar producers in the world have had to meet before. [Applause.] The prospects presented by these conditions will, in my opinion, retard the development of our industry and place its future absolutely in the power of the sugar trust.

I trust that my apprehensions of this gloomy future will prove to be unfounded. I regard the encouragement of the beet-sugar industry as of vital importance to the welfare of the United States, not alone from an economic standpoint, but also from the fact that its growth in this country means a multiplication of farm homes. And while the farmers of our country have some of the frailties of humanity, it must be conceded that from the farm comes, in large portion, the physical strength, intellectual vigor, and moral stamina that distinguish us as a nation. [Applause.]

I know of no industry where there is less danger of monopoly or unfair division of profits than in that of beet sugar. The manufacturer whose capital is invested in a factory is absolutely dependent on the farmer for his raw materials; any injustice or unfair treatment toward the latter will soon work his undoing.

The farmer of to-day is an intelligent and reasoning man, but he will not be imposed on by the beet-sugar manufacturers, for he has recourse to a variety of profitable crops. He thus compels fair treatment of himself.

The farmers of our land have faith in the patriotism and wisdom of the Republican party. That party has always been true to its declaration of principles. Let us in this case make no exception. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that I shall not be able to add anything to the discussion upon this great public question, but I should feel that I had been derelict in duty, representing as I do upon the floor of this House as intelligent, as patriotic, and as enterprising a constituency as is represented in this great House of Representatives, if I did not give some reason for the faith that is in me, and that will impel the vote that I shall cast upon this question. I shall vote, Mr. Chairman, against the bill proposed by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and I shall likewise oppose, reluctantly as I shall do it, the substitute proposed by the minority of that committee. I dislike at all times not to be able to follow such distinguished Representatives of my party as constitute the minority of that committee; but as a Democrat, believing in the principles of my party, believing in the principles of that party as declared with reference to the Philippine Islands, I can not consistently advocate the doctrine which makes the Philippine Islands a part of American territory, giving to its inhabitants the same privileges that are accorded to our own people.

It has been well said that the Philippine Islands are either wholly foreign or wholly domestic. The distinguished leader of the minority, for whose opinions I have the highest respect, said in his speech on yesterday that it would take seventeen Philadelphia lawyers, who are proverbially smart and learned in the law, to determine exactly what the Supreme Court of the United States had decided with reference to the status of the Philippine Islands. I have heard no Republican declare that status. If I understand the position of the Republican party on that question to-day, it is that they are not yet ready to say what shall be the permanent status of the Philippine Islands with reference to the United States. Taking into consideraion, then, the uncertain position occupied by the United States with reference to the legal status of the islands, the doubtful status in the minds of the Republicans themselves, I prefer as a Democrat, following the principles of my party, following its declared principles on this subject, and that is to treat the Philippine Islands as foreign territory, at least until the time shall arrive when its permanent status shall be irrevocably fixed. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill. I am not voting against the minority proposition or the majority bill on the ground that I am in favor of a high protective tariff, for I am not. So far as the industries of my State are concerned, if I believed that the Philippine Islands were a part of this great Republic, I would vote for the minority substitute, because I hold that every citizen of this great Republic wherever the flag floats is entitled to the same rights, the same privileges, the same powers, and the same duties should be exacted of him as of any other citizen wherever he may live. But I do not believe that. It is not true. The Republican party itself does not say it is true. So, for that reason, following Democratic precedents, following the declared purposes of my party, adhering to those principles as they have been declared, I shall vote against it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to one other proposition before I take my seat. Republican Member of Congress after Republican Member of Congress has stood upon his feet on this floor and has referred to the Democratic party as a free-trade party. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and from him on down, every one has declared the Democracy to be a free-trade party. I want to straighten that record, if I can, now. The Democratic party, and I assert it without fear of successful contradiction by even so able, astute, and strong a special pleader as is the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, has never declared for free trade. It is not now for free trade. It never has been for free trade in all of its history. What is the test? Not the declaration made by a member of the party in the heat of debate, however distinguished and able he may be, not the declaration of two or more members of a political party, but the true test, the only test, to determine the faith of any political party is its platform declarations and its legislative enactments when it has the power to make law. If that is a fair test, then I want to invite your attention for a moment or two to what the Democratic party has declared on the subject of tariff.

I go back to the time when the Democratic party as a national organization made its first platform declaration on this subject, and that was in 1840. From then until now the Democratic party has stood consistently, "in season and out of season," for a tariff as the best means of raising revenue for the support of the Government. In 1840 they said this:

That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government.

In after years, from 1840 down to 1868, they reaffirmed that declaration. In 1868 they said this:

A tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country.

In 1872 the convention that nominated Mr. Greeley made this declaration:

We demand a system of Federal taxation which shall not unnecessarily interfere with the industry of the people and which shall provide the means necessary to pay the expenses of the Government, economically administered, the pensions, the interest on the public debt, and a moderate reduction annually of the principal thereof; and recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congressional districts and to the decision of the Congress thereon, wholly free from Executive interference or dictation.

The convention in 1872 which nominated Mr. O'Conor said this:

That we favor a judicious tariff for revenue purposes only, and that we are unalterably opposed to class legislation, which enriches a few at the expense of the many, under the plea of protection.

In 1876 we said this:

We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

In 1880 our declaration was:

A tariff for revenue only.

In 1884 they said this:

Knowing full well, however, that legislation affecting the operations of the people should be cautious and conservative in method, not in advance of public opinion, but responsive to its demands, the Democratic party is pledged to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests. But in making reduction in taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth. From the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be. Moreover, many industries have come to rely upon legislation for successful continuance, so that any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and the capital thus involved. The process of reform must be subject in the execution to this plain dictate of justice: All taxation shall be limited to the requirements of economical government. The necessary reduction and taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country. Sufficient revenue to pay all the expenses of the Federal Government, economically administered, including pensions, interest, and principal of the public debt, can be got under our present system of taxation from the custom-house taxes on fewer imported articles, bearing heaviest on articles of luxury and bearing lightest on articles of necessity. We therefore denounce the abuses of the existing tariff, and, subject to the preceding limitations, we demand that Federal taxation shall be exclusively for public purposes and shall not exceed the needs of the Government economically administered.

In 1888 we said:

Our established domestic industries and enterprises should not and need not be endangered by the reduction and correction of the burdens of taxation. On the contrary, a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises by giving them assurance of an extended market and steady and continuous operation.

In the interests of American labor, which should in no event be neglected, the revision of our tax laws contemplated by the Democratic party should promote the advantage of such labor, by cheapening the cost of necessaries of life in the home of every workingman, and at the same time securing to him steady and remunerative employment. Upon this question of tariff reform, so closely concerning every phase of our national life, and upon every question involved in the problem of good government, the Democratic party submits its principles and professions to the intelligent suffrages of the American people.

In 1892 the Democratic party declared:

We denounce Republican protection as a fraud—a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of a few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

In 1896 this was the declaration of the Democratic party:

We hold that tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue, such duties to be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country and not discriminate between class or section, and that taxation should be limited by the needs of the Government, honestly and economically administered.

In 1900 they said:

We condemn the Dingley tariff law as a trust-breeding measure, skillfully devised to give the few favors which they do not deserve and to place upon the many burdens which they should not bear. Tariff laws should be amended by putting the products of trusts upon the free list to prevent monopoly under the plea of protection.

In 1904 here is the declaration as to robbery, about which so much has been said:

We denounce protection as a robbery of the many to enrich the few, and we favor a tariff limited to the needs of the Government, economically administered, and so levied as not to discriminate against any industry, class, or section, to the end that the burdens of taxation shall be distributed as equally as possible. We favor a revision and a gradual reduction of the tariff by the friends of the masses and for the common weal, and not by the friends of its abuses, its extortions, and its discriminations, keeping in view the ultimate ends of "equality of burdens and equality of opportunities," and the constitutional purpose of raising a revenue by taxation, to wit, the support of the Federal Government in all its integrity and virility, but in simplicity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that was not a denunciation of protection in the abstract, but it was a denunciation of the principle of protection as practiced by the Republican party, making it possible for goods manufactured in this country to be shipped thousands of miles from here and sold to the foreigner at a very much less price than the American farmer could buy them, so that in that platform the denunciation as "robbery" is not of the simple abstract question of protection. We can not have a tariff for revenue, no matter how slight, but that it will in some degree afford protection to somebody. They did not denounce this question of protection per se in the abstract, but they did denounce it as practiced by the Republican party, and by the aid of which they had fostered and built up the great trusts of the country which are now sapping the very lifeblood of the people.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I am against this proposition. I want to put the Democratic party right. We are not a free-trade party, never have been, are not now, and never will be. The Democratic party has always stood for a tariff on imports, but they have demanded that the tariff should be so levied as to weigh lightest upon those who could least afford to carry the burden and heaviest upon those who could best afford to carry it; that that tariff should be so levied as not to build up a few favored industries at the expense of the entire American people; that that tax should be so levied as to produce a revenue, not to prohibit the importation of goods; that that tariff should be so levied as to raise sufficient revenue for the honest, economical, ample administration of the affairs of this Government. A tariff beyond that, a tariff levied purely and simply to enrich the few at the expense of the many is a robbery, and it can not be denominated anything else.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote, as I said in the beginning, against the bill proposed by these gentlemen. They talk about consistency. They twit us with being inconsistent. Why, in 1896, I believe it was, the Republican party which now proclaims to the world that it has always been the consistent and unflinching advocate of the gold standard, in its platform denounced the Administration of Mr. Cleveland for what they said were his efforts to demonetize silver. And yet they talk of consistency!

Why, the Democratic party has been consistent on that question as on this. The Democratic party has always stood for bimetallism, the use of both gold and silver as the money of the country. The Democratic party has always stood for a tariff as I have stated it, and stands there to-day; and, occupying that position, I can not vote for a bill which, while claiming to be in the fatherly interest of the Filipinos, and framed on the assumption that they are the wards of this people, undertakes to do what this bill will do—deliver the islands wholly into the hands of the sugar and tobacco trusts for exploitation. If I were not impressed with the view that the Philippines are not a part of this country, I do not hesitate to say if this bill came here and it was purely a question of standing by the sugar planter of Louisiana, the beet-sugar men of Colorado, Michigan, and Wisconsin, or the little brown man in the Philippines, I should stand by my own blood and bone in Louisiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin. I should stand by the American farmer, and I would not support this bill, because I believe it is not meant for the Filipino, but it is meant to allow the sugar trust to exploit the Philippines to their hearts' content.

I thank you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, the objections to the policy of free trade with the Philippine Islands could easily have been foreseen before those islands were annexed to the United States. The policy involved in this bill is no surprise to the country. It was ordained seven years ago, when the treaty of Paris was ratified, and unless we are to suppose that the American people should prove false to the fundamental principle of their political gospel, which was in existence before they were and which they had religiously observed until that time, it was inevitable that sooner or later we should have free trade with the Philippine Islands. I do not have any sympathy with those gentlemen who were the original advocates of annexation and who are now viewing with alarm the threatened destruction of American industries. I think they should manfully recognize that they are simply going to pay the price for having indulged in some beautiful rhetoric about the flag, how it should never be hauled down no matter for what purpose it had been run up, and also for the pleasure of standing upon the mount of prophecy and seeing dazzling visions of an illimitable trade destined never to exist. They are paying the penalty to-day for having contributed toward making the Philippine Islands American territory.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who is one of the most genuine orators I have ever listened to upon this floor, in a burst of piety and eloquence yesterday credited the providence of God with the responsibility or the glory for our possession of the Philippine Archipelago. This observation of my friend reminded me of a remark credited to Mr. Henry Labouchere concerning a celebrated British statesman. He did not find fault, Mr. Labouchere said, that that statesman should now and then be found with an ace up his sleeve, but he did object when he claimed that it was put there by Divine Providence. [Laughter.] Horace, in his Art of Poetry, has said that you should not introduce a deity upon the scene unless there were some very hard knot to untie, which it would require a deity to do, and it seems to me gentlemen who have defended our Philippine policy here have acted strictly within the rule laid down by Horace. They have a hard knot to untie, and they have frequently introduced Providence into this debate. It is a convenient refuge to fly to when one is hard pressed for argument.

The policy of free trade was established, to my mind, when we annexed the Philippine Islands, and my action was determined for me by others in spite of my opposition when annexation was decreed, and I feel constrained to support free trade as a necessary result of annexation. It was ordained when we bought from Spain the bloodiest foreign war in which this Republic ever engaged. I say foreign war, because those people never owed us any allegiance whatever, and the war was purely one of conquest and subjugation. It was a war aptly characterized by the fine line cited by Mr. Mead:

Cursed is the war no poet sings.

Imagine, if you can, an American poet singing and the American schoolboy declaiming the most glorious exploit of that war, the capture of the Philippine chieftain by American soldiers in Philippine uniforms at the very moment when he was extending to them succor from impending starvation.

The bill before the House illustrates, to my mind, one of the inherent vices of our Philippine policy. Whom do we represent here to-day? The Secretary of War was in doubt whether he primarily represented the people of the Philippines or the people of this country. A great banker may at the same moment of time—because it has been done—represent an insurance company which buys and the banking firm which sells securities. [Laughter.] Another Napoleon of finance at the head of an insurance company may in his wisdom and benevolence disburse the trust funds in his hands for the conversion of the political heathen in the United States. [Laughter.]

But we are sitting under peculiar sanction. We are the trustees of the American people and can have no divided allegiance. We are bound strictly to the duty that we owe our people. It is hardly for us to indulge in self-congratulation over our benevolence. In the first place, it is a purely obtrusive benevolence. The Filipino people have not asked for it. We have forced it upon them at the cannon's mouth. In the next place, we are not a missionary society, but the chosen servants of the American people, and to my mind it appears hypocritical self-palaver and repugnant to all sound notions of official responsibility for us to congratulate ourselves, when we are using powers we hold in trust, on the benevolence we are showing the people of the Philippine Islands.

Who represents the people of those islands to-day? Suppose that they had the power that we have, and were making tax laws to-day for both themselves and for us. I am not saying what they might think best to give us in their benevolence, but some might think it well for them to have peculiar trade relations with the great group of nations which nature had given them as neighbors. Has that fact any consideration to-day? When one attempts to represent both sides in a trade, he is not apt adequately to represent either.

I believe that when the Philippine Islands became American territory they were entitled to that uniformity of duties prescribed by the Constitution, and it was their constitutional right to trade with other portions of American territory. I know the Supreme Court has decided differently from that by a majority of one in the Porto Rico case. There were two cases decided in one day, involving two apparently contradictory positions. There were two groups of four justices, and one justice rendered the opinion of the court in one case and then he joined the other group of four justices and rendered the opinion in that case. One of the other justices, who upheld the constitutionality of that act, said the two positions were absolutely irreconcilable. The circumstances of a decision have very much to do with the weight that it receives with a member of the political department of the Government bound by his own oath to defend the Constitution. Four of the justices, notwithstanding that decision in the Porto Rico case, in a subsequent case decided still that that policy was unconstitutional. Now, if the decision of the court does not bind even the justices themselves—and how could a decision ever be reversed if it did bind them—how can it be said to bind Members of Congress, members of a coordinate branch of the Government?

The Supreme Court, for instance, has decided that an income tax is not constitutional. Suppose a proposition for an income tax were submitted to this House, would any Member on the other side be able to vote for that tax in the face of the decision of the court? In that view of it the income-tax question was settled by a majority opinion for all time.

I believe that the policy of taxation against people inhabiting American territory is not only contrary to our Constitution, but if we had only an unwritten constitution it would be contrary to the very genius of our institutions. That was the position I took in the Porto Rican case when I opposed the passage of that bill.

But if I did not feel impelled, Mr. Chairman, to vote in favor of free trade with the Philippine Islands, upon the high political grounds I have referred to, I confess as a purely economic question I should hesitate to vote for this bill. I am for judicious revision of the tariff, but I am not in favor of a change of tariff by grafting upon our body politic tropical parasites which may absorb the vital forces of the American commonwealth. [Applause.] I am unable to see—speaking now from a purely economic standpoint—I am unable to see any economic ground that would support free trade with the Philippine Islands that would not more strongly support free trade with almost any other portion of the earth's surface.

They are at the antipodes, and are not more remote in distance than are their civilization and their social system different from our own. In their standard of living, their scale of wages, their climate, and their soil they differ almost as radically from us as do any people upon the globe. It is said they can not raise sugar in competition with our American farmers because their methods of production are antiquated and their sugar low grade, and the soil adapted to the raising of it very limited in amount. But suppose some American with skill and capital, like Mr. Atkins, the great Cuban sugar planter, should go there, or suppose that Germans or Englishmen should go there with modern machinery, and equip mills and raise sugar as they raise it in Cuba, do you fancy we should have on our hands simply the question of sun-dried sugar made with carabaos? We should have 96° sugar, and, in my opinion, be likely to have sugar made there as cheaply as in Cuba.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania said: "Why, the American capitalist will not go to such a remote place as the Philippine Islands; he will choose territory where there are railroads and schools and facilities for business," but I say to you, gentlemen, the American capitalist is emphatically a pioneer. He loves to plant his money in a mine upon a distant mountain side; he loves to go into an empty territory and to places remote from civilization, in the hope that some time his own will return to him a hundredfold. The Philippine Islands with free trade is the very spot that the American capitalist would seek.

Take the Sandwich Islands. I think we are likely to have reproduced the same condition that we had after we made the treaty with those islands. I have heard it said in debate on this floor that before the making of the treaty the Sandwich Islands were producing only about 11,000 tons of sugar a year, and I have also heard it said upon good authority that it was urged at that time that the limit of their production was about 70,000 tons, and yet this last year I believe they produced 400,000 tons. Suppose we have three-quarters of a million acres of the 70,000,000 acres in the Philippines devoted to sugar culture. If, as Governor Taft said, the Philippine Islands have more arable land, more rich soil, than Japan, with her 50,000,000 of people; if, as Governor Wright said, the Philippine soil will raise more sugar to the acre than that of the Sandwich Islands; if, as our officers in their reports have repeatedly said, the Filipino laborer is superior to the Chinese laborer, it seems to me that we are willfully closing our eyes and we are making ourselves the victims of a self-delusion if we do not see that we are perhaps sounding the knell of the sugar industry in this country.

In my opinion, the present sugar duty might have been made somewhat lower than it is, but I believe there should have been a very substantial duty. I believe that the effect of that duty has been to stimulate the production of sugar in this country, and if the farmers could be assured that it would be stable we should see still greater quantities produced here, and ultimately a lowering of the price. It is a great thing for the farmer, because it aids in diversifying agriculture and giving him a new profitable crop, and in justice we should remember that the farmer has been compelled to bear the brunt of the burden of the policy of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So I say, Mr. Chairman, and I wish to state this case precisely as it appears to my mind, if I felt free to treat this question purely as an economic question and if I did not feel impelled by the views I have upon the constitutional and great underlying political questions, I should vote against this bill. The farmer is paying the penalty because some of our statesmen at a critical time in the history of the nation saw fit to "think imperially."

Now, that is all that I intended to say upon this bill, but certain allusions to the Commonwealth that I have the honor to represent in part lead me to add a few words more. I shall indulge in no eulogy, because I do not wish to offend some sensitive gentlemen who in this debate have alluded to her with perhaps something approaching asperity. My friend the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], as I understand it, said that Massachusetts had been brought up by hand from infancy upon the pap of protection, and this taunt was echoed by the leader of the minority. Well, Mr. Chairman, if she was brought up by hand upon that diet she was brought up by a more powerful hand than hers, because she was torn by force from the breast of her natural mother, which is the sea. I think I shall not be accused of exaggeration when I say that Massachusetts in a far higher degree than any of her sister colonies inherited that instinct which made the mother country the mistress of the ocean.

She went into commerce and grew rich, and after the war of 1812, when she sat among the ruins of her commerce, destroyed by embargoes and by war, with a sublime patience and courage went to work to build it up again, and then a new obstacle was thrust between her and the sea in the shape of high tariff duties imposed in spite of and against the protest and votes of her Representatives, and imposed upon her by the Representatives from the South and the West. Is she to be sneered at to-day because she gracefully acquiesced in that policy forced upon her—acquiesced as she always has in any decreed policy of this nation? And so she embarked in manufacture, and, under this system of protection if you will, but largely by her thrift and the skill of her mechanics and the happy genius of her people, she became rich, although she is not to-day, relatively to the rest of the country, so preeminent in wealth as she was when this policy was adopted.

And she has not lagged behind the other States, I think you will pardon me for saying, in other respects. She has contributed to education, to art, to literature, to the prevention of grinding up the souls of young children in workshops, and to those other noble things which, far more than your wealth and your wars and your crusades undertaken to force "education" upon reluctant peoples at the point of the bayonet, will tell for your real and abiding glory. [Applause.]

What is her fault to-day? It is that under her system of untrammeled freedom of speech and of public discussion a great and increasing number of her people have dared to think and to say that the whirling changes of the nine years that have elapsed since the passage of the Dingley Act have thrown some of those great schedules out of gear with existing conditions, and that some duties, just, or at least harmless at the time they were enacted, have, by reason of industrial combination to stifle internal competition, and from other reasons, become exorbitant, and instead of protecting the people they are shielding monopoly and aiding it to pick the pockets of the people. [Applause.]

And they are somewhat weary of seeing that ancient friend of ours paraded upon ceremonial occasions, namely, "If the tariff is to be revised, let it be revised by its friends." If the tariff can ever be revised by its friends, can it not be revised by a Congress two-thirds of whose members in both the Senate and the House are Republicans? [Applause.]

I think that our noble governor never said a truer word—that a truer word never was spoken—than when he said that upon a "stand-pat platform" last fall the State would have been lost to the Republicans.

Now, the people of Massachusetts are only thinking a little in advance of some of the people—not all of the other people—of this country. Soon this idea will invade New York and Illinois and Ohio, gathering force as it moves; and I say to you that if we do not treat protection as a rational principle instead of a cast-iron, immutable set of schedules, we are liable to have the Democratic party, and then possibly the deluge. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I confess that it is with some diffidence that I rise to speak upon this bill, because it is hard to think what can be said that has not already been said on this subject. The question with which this bill is at all concerned and many questions with which it is not at all concerned have been argued ably upon this floor. And it is almost impossible that I shall be able to say anything instructive or interesting upon this subject. I am further overwhelmed with embarrassment at having at the outset to differ with my distinguished friend the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, upon some of his opinions as to the brilliant future of the Philippine Islands and as to the noble character of the Filipino people. I can not bring it to my mind that there is any brilliant future for the Philippine Islands, and with the sole exception of the love for the family and the home that the average Filipino possesses I can see nothing to admire in his character. I am glad to say I can vote for this bill with absolute conviction that its passage can not damage one iota any American industry or any American labor employed in that industry.

I do not profess to be an expert upon sugar or tobacco, but I can not bring myself to think for a moment, concerning the sugar question, that one small island in the Philippines, the island of Negros, the only place where sugar has ever been grown in the Philippines, an island without a port or a harbor, surrounded by such shoal water that nothing but barges and canoes can land upon it, can ever produce enough sugar to have any effect upon the price of sugar in this country. And all the more am I convinced of this fact when I am told that the labor that is employed on that island, at least the majority of it, must be imported from other islands; and those who have seen the Filipino imported laborer know that we have not much to fear from him. So far as the tobacco question is concerned, I will simply say to anyone who is afraid that Philippine cigars will ever compete with American cigars, "Smoke them and you will be convinced."

But, in my opinion, the question involved in the passage of this bill, the great principle underlying it, is not a question of expediency, but a question of national honor. In passing it we shall only be doing that which the Filipinos rightfully expect from us and that which we owe to them and to ourselves to do for them. We have gone too far now to honorably withdraw.

We owe it to the Filipinos that so long as we shall be in possession of the Philippine Islands we will do all we can to give them the comforts and the blessings inherent in American citizenship. We owe it to them to assist them in every way possible to build up their industries, to improve their condition, and to educate their children. For one I am not in favor of holding the Philippine Islands as a part of the territory of the United States a moment longer than we absolutely have to. [Applause.] I am in favor of turning those islands over to the Philippine people to govern for themselves at the first moment that they have proved to us that they are capable of governing themselves, but I am not in favor of turning them over a moment before that time. How soon that time may come Providence alone knows; but I say the sooner the better for them and for us [renewed applause]; and the way to speed that moment is to do everything that this nation possibly can for their material benefit and for their mental and moral uplifting.

There are two prime characteristics in the Filipino people that render them to-day, in my opinion, absolutely incapable of self-government. The average Filipino mind can form no conception of the duty of a public officer to the people. The average Filipino mind can form no conception of the dignity of labor. Until the Filipino mind shall have proved itself capable of forming these two conceptions, it would be, in my mind, nothing short of a national crime to turn the islands over to them, for it could do nothing else, even with all the safeguards of an international treaty of neutrality, but condemn them to almost immediate anarchy and bloodshed. We can not blame the Filipino for not understanding the obligation of a public officer to the people. Until the occupancy of those islands by this Government, for hundreds of years under Spanish rule, the Filipinos had hardly ever seen a man in public office who was animated by any other motives save purely the exploitation of Spanish interests and the filling, incidentally, of his own pocket.

I was told by a gentleman who has resided many years in the Philippines, and who has acted on very many occasions as an interpreter, that when he was first called upon to translate the phrase "Public office is a public trust" he could find no words to make that plain to the Filipino mind. That phrase seems to be simply untranslatable into Tagalog or Spanish.

I have frequently heard it said in this debate that the Filipino is lazy and will not work any more than he absolutely has to; and small blame to him for that, for I am prepared to say that if the hardest-working Member of this House were to live for many years in that outrageous climate he would be lazy too. [Laughter.] But there is something of much deeper root in the Filipino character than mere laziness, and that is that he thinks it is dishonorable to work; and with these conceptions at the very root of Filipino character, how can we imagine for a moment that they could form a republic which could live for a week?

I desire to quote briefly at this point from the memorial presented to the members of Secretary Taft's party by those Filipinos who argued in favor of immediate independence. I might add that they came before us under the chaperonage of a Filipino patriot from Boston. [Laughter.] So it is apparent that some Boston people are for free Filipinos as well as for free hides. [Renewed laughter.] I will only quote a very few sentences, but this I desire briefly to call attention to, because this was the great argument they advanced to show that the Filipinos are now in a position to govern themselves. This was mentioned by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], but I would like to quote the exact language. They say:

It is undeniable that there exists in the Philippines, in sufficient numbers, the so-called "directing class," a small portion of which is employed by the present government in all the branches of administration, cooperating actively and effectively with the government in its gubernatorial labor.

If the Filipino archipelago has a governable popular mass, called upon to obey, and a directing mass in charge of leading, it then has conditions to govern itself by itself. These are the only two factors, without counting the casuals, who determine the popular capacity of a country. The directing class is the entity that knows how to lead and the popular mass is the entity that knows how to obey. The grade of culture in which the directing class and the popular mass of the Filipino people find itself is strictly and relatively comparable between itself, from one to the other class.

That is the foundation upon which they propose to build a republic modeled after the American Republic. They refer quite casually to the fact that there are a number of languages spoken in the Philippine Islands—some one hundred, I believe. They all sounded a good deal alike to me, so that I can not be accurate on that point. They say:

The unity in a language is a condition, yes, but not necessary to enjoy self-government. Spain, Switzerland, Germany, Russia, and other free States do not possess it, and nevertheless they govern their own destinies. The plurality of dialects which are spoken in the Philippines is not an impediment to the progress of a government.

I would like now to read a sentence. I think it ranks with Mark Twain's celebrated story of the "jumping frog" as a literary gem:

The fact that there lacks the immortal figure of Washington and the insignia of Jefferson in the Philippines does not impossibilitate it for its own government. Nations who are to-day independent, many prodigious in civilization, have constituted themselves in political liberty without having possessed personals of its stature. Cuba and Panama, declared republics yesterday by the same North America, neither was addicted to the memory of such great men.

And upon this evidence they ask us to confer upon them the blessings of self-government.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print the English translation of this memorial in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document in question is as follows:

[Copy of the memorial asking for the independence of the Philippines. Presented to Taft's party in its visit to these islands by Filipino citizens.]

To the honorable Secretary of War of the Government of the United States of North America and the honorable Congressmen that compose his illustrious party. Honorable gentlemen, greeting:

The inhabitants of this archipelago who, yesterday, directed affectionate and cordial salutes of welcome to you in various forms of signs of jubilee, shall soon bid you good-by with the hopes that this visit, with which you are honoring them, shall be fruitful in benefits for this country and cause another stamp of glory to be added to yours. Before you abandon these shores we, the subscribers to this document, having the belief of interpreting the popular opinion because we believe in reflecting the true and unanimous feeling of the country, we take the liberty, in our country's name, to address ourselves to the Congress of the United States, authorized by the same, and through you, as a dignified channel, to forward our petition, which is unique and exclusive and which we express in a solemn form as a conclusion of the following considerations:

Neither have the epochs of great prosperity and abundance nor the hard times which this country benefited and suffered have succeeded in dissipating from it the constant desire to be, some day, master of its own actions.

Historical facts affirm that before the Spanish domination the Filipino people had their own culture and civilization derived from the purity of customs, the morals in the acts and natural conditions of its inhabitants. It is evident that there existed a government of order in the Philippines at that time. The rights of property were not then violated nor the personal privileges were profanated. Slavery, in its social sense of the word, was not known in this country, as well as cannibalism, alcoholism, socialism, anarchy, nihilism, or communism, nor was there any knowledge atrocious and hair-raising crimes.

Aided by such happy circumstances, the Filipino people have been assimilating the occidental civilization gradually, little by little, without any pressure or violence, and the assimilation has been so perfect a labor of more than three centuries, that it results that the extreme Orient is the country in which the influence of the Occident terminates.

Its present culture being occidental, its characteristics and popular feelings shall overfloat in all orders of life. It did not loose it, nor ever shall.

In spite of its undoubtful political capacity resulting from its present grade of culture and civilization, we, the Filipinos, are refused, in various tones and forms, conditions for self-government when precisely acts, experiences, and considerations speak for themselves, among which the following deserve to be cited:

A. It is a fact that the Filipino people is indisputably governable. The period of the Spanish domination and that of the present American sovereignty have demonstrated it. The political condition of a country principally depends upon the grade of its being governed. From a higher grade of governing the popular masses depend upon for its higher political condition. When a country like the Philippines does give marked proofs of knowing how to obey for a period of more than three hundred years without any serious disturbances or deep political commotions, it should humanely be supposed, as all shows that it is progressive, that it is in possession of the art of leading, ever so much more when it has, among other faculties, assimilations which distinguishes it from the rest of the other countries of the extreme Orient.

B. If the mass of a country is governable, a part of it should necessarily have to be that termed as the directing class, such as in the journey of progress, the same in the moral order as in the material, the nations do not progress in comparison, some go forward and others behind, this can be observed in the inhabitants of a country.

It is undeniable that there exists in the Philippines, in sufficient numbers, the so-called "directing class," a small portion of which is employed by the present government in all the branches of administration, cooperating actively and effectively with the government in its gubernatorial labor.

C. If the Filipino Archipelago has a governable popular mass called upon to obey and a directing mass in charge of leading, it then has conditions to govern itself by itself. These are the only two factors, without counting the casuals, who determine the popular capacity of a country. The directing class is the entity that knows how to lead and the popular mass is the entity that knows how to obey. The grade of culture in which the directing class and the popular mass of the Filipino people find itself is strictly and relatively comparable between itself, from one to the other class.

It is not feasible to compare the inculture of the Filipino popular mass with that of the American, as an example, which has less of the popular mass, but more of the directing class, or again, the culture of the Filipino directing class to that of the American, which, of course, is greater, compared to that of its popular mass, this same rule being applicable in respect to the numbering quantity of one class with relation to that of the other, a theory which should not be lost sight of, remembering that there exists maxim, half, and smallest grades indistinctively in the Saxon kind from that of the Latin than in the general scale of self-government.

D. Due to this same comparedness of the grade of culture in which the directing class of the Filipino people finds itself with relation to that of the popular mass, it can be foretold without any fear of mistake that, when the time comes when the country rules its own destinies, far from being tyrannical, scrupulous as harbored by some, a model of justice shall be the government that should establish itself, because neither the culture of the directing class should be so superior as to make itself be obeyed tyrannically, nor the inculture of the popular mass should be so great as to allow itself to be tyrannized. In a case of notable disequilibrium between the culture of a class and the inculture of another is when the tyranny of a country could take place, which does not exist in the Philippines, where, in this respect, it is completely relative.

E. The conditions of the Filipino people which govern it politically, derived from its secular connivance with a race from which it inherited wise principles of government, which, although be it from the Latin class, are recognized by common consent by the civilized nations, dating much before the American domination, a political capacity which the Filipinos gave gallant proofs of during the ephemerous life of the late Filipino republic, in whose territory, in spite of all that took place over the hot ashes of the revolution against that which had been its metropolis, there then reigned complete tranquillity; the orders issued from high spheres were executed without any pungency by the low ones. There was no complete economical welfare then, because of that abnormal state, it is true; neither is there now.

As a fact which proves the culture that the Filipino people possessed before the Star-Spangled Banner waved over its dominions can be cited the statistics of its then intellectual movement. In the academical course from 1896 to 1897 there was in that university a registered list of students in the following form: Fifteen in theology, 7 in canonical law, 1,298 in civil law, 357 in medicine, 169 in pharmacy, 244 in the notarial profession, 160 in philosophy and letters, and 54 in sciences.

F. If the Filipinos did not have beforehand conditions for self-government they would not have been able to aid America with the efficacy with which it has until now been doing in the implantation in these islands of a government which is completely new. It would have stumbled with unsurpassable difficulties and produced deep disturbances in all the order of administration, much more when the institution of the present government was rapid, nearly instantaneous, surprising the natives who, without being previously prepared, soon assimilated, however, new theories and doctrines in matters of government and administration. This affirmation is not denied. In the six years that the country has carried under the present régime, the Filipinos, scarce in numbers who took part in the same, over whose shoulders weighs the greatest part of responsibility, did not give signs of inaptitude. On the contrary, their conduct is of a happy result, as is shown and more profoundly in that of the branch of municipal government, completely in charge of the native element.

G. The American people, upon taking upon themselves the tutoring of this archipelago in virtue of the protocol signed in Paris, contracted the responsibility of aiding the Filipino people in establishing a sound government in these islands. It will not, undoubtedly, draw itself from this responsibility if, in spite of the wise recommendation of McKinley, which consist in procuring to respect our habits, customs, and laws they should implant in these islands a government which would be not adaptable to our way of being, giving clearly to understand that the government that should be established has to be a government of a strictly Filipino character.

H. The caciquism of which there is made a pretext in order to deny the political capacity of the Filipinos shall never exist in this country, where the slavery, which is a minimous term for it, has also never existed, given to its special customs, apart from that there has not yet been found the case in which one race rules over others of the same race, and presuming that if later this should exist, precisely when the country should be independent, goes to show that in other free states the same is known to exist. In this case it would be but little humane to attribute it particularly to the Filipinos only as a motive to deny their political capacity, a defect which is peculiar in humanity in general.

I. The unity in a language is a condition; yes, but not necessary to enjoy self-government.

Spain, Switzerland, Germany, Russia, and other free states do not possess it, and nevertheless they govern their own destinies. The plurality of dialects which are spoken in the Philippines is not an impediment to the progress of a government. This plurality of dialects already existed when Spain governed this country, and during these centuries of domination it did not disturb Spain in its affairs of government, because Spain would make use of the two common dialects in this archipelago, which were Spanish and Tagalo, and indistinctively making use of one or the other of these dialects. America is now governing the archipelago without being impossibilitated in the discharge of its mission by the plurality of dialects, which have not disappeared. On the contrary, that has increased with the English language, which is also spoken to-day.

J. The riches that form the vitality of a country as one of its principal resources is regulated by the importance of the products that are exported from it. The exportation from the Philippines—not that of to-day, which is more, but that of former years—was then, if not equal, a little less than the exportations of many oriental countries and much more than that of North America when that country was declared independent.

The fact that there lacks the immortal figure of Washington and the insignia of Jefferson in the Philippines does not impossibilitates it for its own government. Nations who are to-day independent, many prodigious in civilization, have constituted themselves in political liberty without having possessed personals of its stature. Cuba and Panama, declared republics yesterday by the same North America, neither were addicted to the memory of such great men.

L. It is improper and out of place to assay the conditions of this country for a free and independent government by comparing them with those of other countries of the extreme Orient, such as Japan, for example, for if when superiority partly exists on their part and inferiority on the part of the Philippines it is precisely through the fact that those are independent, and as such they agitate and unfold themselves with entire liberty, without any fetters, while those whose inhabitants are of an intellectual level much superior than those of the free states, in the judgment of authors of indisputable authority, controlled in all organs and institutions, they hardly have adjective life.

Such precedents being enunciated, it must be admitted that the Filipinos are capable for an independent government, and among the variety of forms of this class of government they choose an immediate independence, with a declaration of perpetual neutrality, in preference to another with a protectorate, because this form results in the most honorable means and more economical for America, and more sure to affiance the integrity and soundness of that which shall be a Filipino state, while the independence with a protectorate would be expensive as well to the protector and the protected and liable to conflicts for the first.

Whereas all that we have stated, and depending upon the justice of the American nation, we ask of the Congress of the United States of North America, in the name of the Filipino people, for the immediate independence of the Philippine Islands, with a declaration of perpetual neutrality.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When I say that there are no Filipinos to-day competent to hold public office, I absolutely except such men as Tavera or Legurda or Luzuriaga, members of the Philippine Commission, and Arellano, justice of the supreme court of the Philippines. Those are all men who would be honored and respected citizens of any country, and there are a few others like them. Judge Arellano would adorn the bench of any court in the United States. But such men are the exception and not the rule. I am frank to say that for the average Filipino, the kind we are sometimes pleased to call the "little brown brother," I have no love whatever. I liked him a great deal better when I read of him than I like him now when I have seen him. I liked him far better in the abstract than I do now in the concrete. This is where I differ with my friend the gentleman from Ohio when I say that for the very reason that he is so shiftless, so incapable, so untrustworthy, and so helpless, is not that all the stronger reason why this nation should reach out a helping hand to him, both as regards his material benefit and his moral and mental welfare?

We will do the first by passing this bill. The second we are already doing in the schools. And that is one of the greatest works that has ever been done by any nation in the history of the world. All honor to those American teachers who have left their friends and comforts at home and are giving up the best years of their lives to the educating of those Filipino children. It is the most important of all the work that we can do for the Filipinos, because it is to those children and to their children and children's children, perhaps, that we must look for those who shall in the future accomplish a regeneration of the Filipinos. It is to them that we must look for the formation of a national character and for a high conception of public morals. It is to them that we must look for men, honest and capable of holding public office. This national regeneration may come within a comparatively few years or it may not come for decades; but until the day shall come when the Filipinos as a people shall grow to be honest and industrious, when they shall have developed a national character and an understanding of public duties, we must, for the sake of our national honor hold those islands as a part of our possessions, for to surrender them before that would be a crime. In the meantime, what shall we do for them?

Shall this nation, which is now carrying on the greatest charitable work in the history of the world, take a backward step? Shall we govern them as England governs her colonies, for the purpose of exploitation and for our own interests, or shall we consider them in the light of a trust turned over to us temporarily by Providence and govern them in the interest of the Filipino people? We must do one thing or the other. We can not treat them for some purposes as a dependency to be used for exploitation and for other purposes treat them as a part of our own people. We can not draw them to our breast with one hand and repel them with the other. We can not treat the Philippine Islands for some purposes as foreign territory and for other purposes as territory of the United States. We are about to apply to them our coastwise laws. We are going to compel them to ship their own products in American ships between their own ports. Shall we then deprive them of the privileges of American ports? We have done this deliberately. If we are treating the Philippine Islands for almost all purposes as a part of the United States, how then can the principles of protection or free trade have anything to do with this bill? We are under a high moral obligation to treat the Filipino people fairly. How, then, can we stop to haggle over the question of a few imports? The Filipinos expect, and they rightfully expect, that we shall treat them fairly. The great nations of the world expect it. Our national honor demands it. This bill should be passed as an earnest of the performance of the duty that we have promised and owe to the people of the Philippine Islands. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has fifteen minutes.

Mr. McCALL. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the pending bill. I indorse the arguments and the sentiments so well expressed by my young friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] who has just taken his seat.

This measure is an act of simple justice to the people of the Philippine Islands, and it ought to receive the unanimous support of both branches of Congress. I have always been of the opinion that all territory under the control of the United States should be upon terms of absolute equality in their commercial and civil rights and privileges. If we can not govern territory upon this just and humane principle, we have no right to undertake to govern it at all.

The debate upon this measure has been able and exceptionally interesting, but in some respects it has not been altogether creditable to the American sense of justice and fair play. Gentlemen have spoken in opposition to the bill, in behalf of special interests, and have insisted that if the bill shall become a law the sugar and the tobacco industries particularly will suffer from competition with the products of the Philippine Islands, and, therefore, that the bill is in conflict with the traditional policy of the Republican party for the protection of American labor. Gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the House have announced their purpose of supporting the bill because it is a large step toward ultimate free trade and bespeaks the final overthrow of the policy of protection. Both of these contentions are manifestly illogical. The policy of protection which is so conspicuous a principle in the creed of faith of the Republican party implies, necessarily, that there is something to protect. What is that something? It is the American market. The Republican party stands for the protection of the market created by the 75,000,000 inhabitants of the United States against invasion by foreign producers. That party believes in preserving this splendid market for American producers in all competitive lines, and insists upon absolute free trade among our own people throughout the length and breadth of our own land.

It has been truthfully asserted that an average American consumes as much of the products of sweat and toil as ten of the average of the world's population outside of this country. The market created by the 75,000,000 people in the United States "proper," as my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] aptly termed it in his speech a few days ago, is equivalent to a market created by 750,000,000 of the average of the world's population outside of this country; and it is the best and the richest market enjoyed exclusively by the producers of our nation that exists on all the earth. The purpose of this bill is simply to enlarge our zollverein and include the Philippine Islands, with their six and a half million population, within our free-trade Union and to protect them as well as ourselves in the enjoyment of the market made by our own inhabitants against disastrous competition by foreign producers.

In our legislation for the development of interests and our administration of the affairs of the Philippine Islands we have, in the main, been eminently successful. We have established civil government there granting to the inhabitants of the archipelago a larger share of participation in their own affairs than they ever enjoyed before. We have established a splendid school system and a system of sanitation and internal improvements that must go far toward the permanent advancement of the welfare of those hapless people. In the enactment and execution of these measures all interests in this country have been in practical accord, but when it comes to the extension of commercial privileges to those islands we are met by the stubborn opposition of special interests at home.

The Philippine government a number of years ago imposed an export tax of $7.50 a ton on hemp. This tax was purely for revenue. The hemp produced in the archipelago finds a ready market in all parts of the world, and the imposition of the export tax in no manner affected the industry. By an act of Congress several years ago this export tax upon hemp was repealed upon all hemp brought to the United States and allowed to remain upon all hemp that was sent to foreign countries. This legislation took from the revenues of the Philippine Islands about $550,000 a year, and what did they get in return for it? Not a thing. It was purely in the interest of the cordage industry in this country. Hemp is the chief article of production and export in the Philippine Islands. Last year they produced 128,564 tons, of the value of $22,146,241. Of the amount produced, 72,196 tons were brought to the United States. This large importation to this country was induced by the fact that our cordage manufacturers were given an advantage of $7.50 per ton over their foreign competitors. That legislation was clearly not in the interest of the people of the Philippine Islands, but was solely in the interest of certain special industries in our own country.

About two years ago Congress passed a law extending the coastwise laws of the United States to the Philippine Archipelago, to become operative on the 1st day of July, 1906. After that law goes into operation every pound of freight and every passenger between the United States and the Philippine Islands must be carried in an American boat. It is admitted on all hands that the effect of the law will be to increase substantially the rate on commerce and travel between the United States and the Philippines. It is now generally conceded by those who are familiar with the situation that the law will operate disastrously upon the commerce and the prosperity of the people of the islands. That law was clearly not in the interest of the people of those islands, but was for the sole benefit of the shipowners and shipbuilders of the United States.

And in the consideration of the pending bill we are confronted by the bitter and determined opposition of the beet-sugar and tobacco industries in this country. They insist that this act of palpable justice to the Philippine Archipelago shall not become effective, because they contend it might increase competition in those industries. That aspect of the question has been unduly emphasized in the debate on the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in his splendid speech delivered a few days ago upon this question, said with much eloquence and some degree of unction that while the Constitution did not follow the flag into the Orient, the people of the United States with practical unanimity had decreed that "justice and fair play" should follow it. This is a beautiful sentiment, but shall justice and fair play follow the flag only upon condition that it involves us in no cost or sacrifice? Shall money and commerce be placed above common everyday justice in our dealings with a people entirely under our control? Shall selfishness be the guiding principle of our administration of the affairs of the Philippine Archipelago? Mr. Chairman, if we fall short of the expectation of a just people in discharging our solemn duty toward those islands it will be because of the narrow and blind selfishness and greed of special interests in our own country.

It has been conclusively demonstrated in the debate upon this bill that no industry in the United States can suffer a particle if it should become a law. We import from foreign countries upward of 1,700,000 tons of sugar every year for our own consumption. The entire sugar product of the Philippine Islands in their palmiest days never exceeded 300,000 tons a year. The entire tobacco product of the islands last year was $1,999,000 in value, of which only $6,820 worth was brought to the United States. We sold as much tobacco in the Philippine Islands as was brought from those islands and sold in this country. Labor and culture conditions are such in the archipelago that industrial development there must necessarily be slow. There never will come a time in the existence of this country when the intelligent, efficient, and capable laborers of the United States can possibly suffer by any competition on the part of the inefficient, unintelligent, and indolent inhabitants of these islands. The common and natural market for the sugar and tobacco of the islands is in the Orient and always will be, but if every bit of their export product of sugar and tobacco should be brought to the United States it could not possibly affect in any degree either the sugar or tobacco industries in this country.

But there is a higher question involved in this measure, one affecting the honor of the nation. Underlying it all is a principle of political morals that the people of this country can not afford to overlook. We justly impose trade restrictions upon foreign countries for the protection of our own commerce. Those countries are sovereign and independent and are free to negotiate treaties of amity and commerce with each other and to take steps to retaliate against this and other countries for what they conceive to be unjust restrictions against their commerce. We treat with them upon an equal footing, and the contest for supremacy in the commercial world is a fair and manly one, but this is not the case with the Philippine Islands. They are not a foreign country. They have no sovereign authority. They can negotiate no treaties of trade with foreign powers; they can enact no laws of retaliation against what they conceive to be unjust commercial restrictions imposed by this country. They are utterly helpless and absolutely within our power. Imagine a great, generous, and wealthy country like this absorbing the sovereignty of a weak and defenseless people and enacting laws that will protect its own industries against the industries and the interests of the people whose destiny it controls. Interests between the United States and the Philippine Archipelago may occasionally conflict. If in such conflicts we shall make it our business to protect our interests, who in the name of Heaven will protect the interests of the Filipinos? All this talk about the danger of competition, against this measure of common justice and humanity, is unworthy of the high character of American citizenship, and is a reproach to our common sense of justice. The Filipinos are said to be our wards, and we are their guardians. It is a universal rule of morals in the Anglo-Saxon civilization, observed everywhere and in all instances, that if the interest of the ward and the interest of the guardian shall conflict those of the ward must always be paramount. No man is permitted to put himself in a position where his individual interests will conflict with other interests that he may have in trust; and the the nation certainly can not afford in its policy toward the Filipinos to establish a lower standard of morals than it exacts from its own citizens in their dealings with each other.

The humblest court in all this land would not permit a guardian to set up his own interest as an excuse for not doing justice to his ward. It is our solemn duty to administer the affairs of the Philippine Islands for the benefit and welfare of the people of those islands, and if we can not do this we ought to have the grace to surrender our guardianship and turn it over to a government that will do it.

Mr. SMITH of California rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For a question.

Mr. SMITH of California. Speaking from a purely moral standpoint, how do you justify the 25 per cent that is retained in the bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The bill is progressive in its character. It provides for ultimate free trade. It is the best measure proposed, and it has been explained that the 25 per cent duty on sugar and tobacco is for revenue purposes, and the proceeds will be turned into the Filipino treasury, and if there is anything those people are in need of under existing conditions it is revenue. Of course, they will have to pay it themselves, but it is perhaps a convenient way to get it, and I am for the bill notwithstanding it contains provisions for a temporary imposition of 25 per cent upon the two commodities.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then, if you will just permit one question more, you admit that the United States can afford to do an immoral thing for the sake of about $250,000 a year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstands my position altogether. The 25 per cent provision is intended for the benefit of the Philippine government and not for protection to our industries. If I had the power to rearrange the whole business I would provide absolute free trade from this time and restore the hemp export tax as a source of revenue. That tax was removed in favor of American exporters by an act of Congress, and there is no prospect of its being restored. Therefore I think the tax provision in this bill may be justified on the ground that they need the revenue. The gentleman is doubtless aware that the bill provides for absolute free trade both ways upon all articles after April, 1909.

Our own industrial interests, powerful in politics and society, are always on the ground to protest if any legislation is attempted that seems to them to be inimical to their welfare. The Filipinos are 10,000 miles away. They have no social or political influence in this country, and our solicitude for them under these circumstances should require greater vigilance and care than if they were within our sight and contact and could wield a direct influence in politics and trade.

The flag of this country has been planted in the Orient, perhaps to remain for all time, and it ought to stand as the symbol of complete and absolute justice toward the territory and the people over which it floats. It ought to be the token of a high sense of justice on the part of the American people toward that weak and helpless race that is so completely at their mercy. If our policy toward the Philippines shall not be characterized at all times by the most enlightened sense of justice and fair play, our administration of that trust will be a disgraceful failure. I am led to make these criticisms in view of the character of this debate. I feel that the moral side of this question ought to be emphasized and impressed upon the notice and attention of the country. I have no doubt that the people of the United States are in favor of full and complete justice to the people of the Philippine Islands, and when the matter is called to their notice they will see to it that no concerns of selfish interests shall stand between us and our plain and simple duty.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, from present appearances it would seem that this House is hopelessly divided. One gentleman from Massachusetts told us the other day that he favored free trade between the United States and Canada. Why? Undoubtedly because it would, in his opinion, help his State. Again from the far South comes a strong protest against the reduction of the duty on sugar. Why? Because that section produces sugar. Again from the manufacturers from the North comes a plea for free hides. Why? Because they use hides to make shoes, and they wish to make shoes as cheaply as possible. And so it seems that General Hancock was not so far from right after all when he said the tariff was a local question. In one sense it undoubtedly is, but in the larger view it is not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see if there is not common ground upon which we can all stand.

It is a matter of common knowledge that ours is a trust-ridden, monopoly-cursed country. Prosperous as we are, this is the unvarnished truth. Great corporations have grown up under our system of raising revenue. At first they claimed that they were infants and could not stand alone; so we built a high wall which largely shut out competition. Now they have become so powerful that they openly defy the law, and without hindrance violate the law every day in the year. The American people are the prey of these powerful giants. The American consumer has made them largely what they are; and now in return for his beneficence they punish him, for every day they are shipping their goods abroad and are selling those goods cheaper to the foreigner than they are to us. The man never was born smart enough to defend such a practice successfully. Logic can not make right out of wrong.

Every good man in this Republic, from the President down, would be glad to find a way to put an end to the iniquitous practices of the American trust. How to reach the criminal trust is a question which has so far puzzled the best intellect of the land. But, Mr. Chairman, in the dilemma in which we are, I humbly submit that the very first tariff schedule which should be reduced is that schedule which shuts out competition with the products of the monopoly. Who will deny that the United States Steel Corporation has a practical monopoly of the steel industry of this country? Who will deny that this monopoly is selling its manufactured product cheaper to the foreigner than the American? Then why not reduce the import duty upon such articles to that point which will, if possible, force this trust to sell at least as cheaply to Americans as to foreigners?

Let me say this, Mr. Chairman. I am not a free trader. I favor a moderate but just revision of the tariff. If the farmer and wealth producer receives any benefit from our system of taxation, then the last duty which I will vote to reduce is that which helps these men. We do know that we can make goods cheaper to the consumer by removing part of the duty on trust-made articles. Then why not take those schedules in hand?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, why? That $1,900,000 which the Republican national chairman had in the last campaign did the business. [Laughter.] That $2,800,000 which he had in 1900 did the business, and the almighty dollar will always do the business as long as political parties are willing to elect their Presidents and their Congresses with money contributed by corporations and individuals made rich by laws passed by these very men.

Four years ago I attempted to sound a note of warning. It was a feeble attempt indeed. I sound it again here to-day. The use of money in our elections is a damnable curse. The wretched creature who sells his vote should be put in stripes, and the still more dangerous creature who buys that vote should be put in stripes also and sent along to the penitentiary for a term twice as long.

Never has our country and Congress been more boss-ridden than they are to-day. It is true that there is a healthy indication here and there of an attempt on the part of good men to break up ring rule, but so far as I can see there is absolutely no hope of the passage of any act which will tend to remove the consumer from the clutches of the trust. All agree that something should be done—yes, all from the President down. All agree that we are in the power of monopoly. All admit that they are making us pay more for their goods than foreigners pay. No one will deny that a reduction of the import duty will make goods cheaper to the consumer. Not a solitary Member on this floor will, I venture, insist that the steel trust, for example, needs any protection at all. Then why not reduce the duty upon articles which come in competition with the steel trust? I would like to know just how much this corporation contributed to the campaign fund of the Republican party in 1900 and 1904.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not be misunderstood. I do not pretend that my own party is free from blame. As I have stated before on this floor, the guilt of either party is probably limited by the amount of money its agents can raise. Each party can say to the other, "Et tu quoque;" but that reply never justified wrongdoing since the world began; but it is time the practice were stopped by law, and good men of both political parties should join hands to make our elections clean and pure in the future.

For one I honestly believe that a majority of this Chamber favors a reduction of the duty on trust-manufactured articles, but the will of the majority no longer rules in this body. Why? Because you have tied yourselves hand and foot and delivered yourselves into the hands of three men. This is true. Will anyone dispute it? The Constitution contemplates, as I understand it, that every Member of this body should be the peer of every other Member and enjoy the same rights and privileges; and this would be true had we not voted ourselves in slavery. More than once we have seen petitions circulating around this Chamber asking permission of the Speaker to be allowed to vote on some bill which a majority desired brought before the House. Just think of that, if you please. [Laughter.] Honorable gentlemen, Members of the American House of Representatives, elected and sent here by the sovereign people, actually forced to beg for the privilege of voting. Do you wonder that your President pays little or no attention to your recommendations? Do you not feel humiliated? This is bossism run to seed. Gentlemen, let us put an end to it. If we must have a Committee on Rules, let each side of this Chamber elect its members. Let us put back into the hands of each Member that power which the Constitution intended he should exercise. Your Speaker should be your servant, not your master, just as you are the servants of your constituents. When the ridiculous and arbitrary rules of this House are changed there will be a chance to vote on measures which ought to become laws. Then, and not till then, will this body properly rep-
